The Earl of Shaftesbury v. Russell (8) is an authority that although a statute gives a right to appeal, if a party grieved does not choose to avail himself of that right he may bring an action. But by the 24th section of the 43 Geo. 3. c. 99, which contains the first provision as to appeal, it would appear that such appeal had reference to “an overcharge or over-rating by any assessment,” and not to a complaint of the assessment itself; and so with respect to the 70th and following sections of the 43 Geo. 3. c. 161, until you come to the 73rd section, where an appeal against the assessment itself seems first to be included in the power of appeal. But there are no words used in that section which exclude the right of action by a party whom the assessors had never any right to assess.

clusive of that fact, the plaintiff not having availed himself of his right to appeal. The case of The Earl of Radnor v. Reeve (9), decided upon sections 35. and 38. of the 25 Geo. 3. c. 43, which are identical with the provisions as to appeal in the statute of the 43 Geo. 3. c. 161, is directly in point. It was in that case expressly held, that where a statute declares the judgment of commissioners of appeal to be final, their judgment cannot be questioned in an action of trespass. The plaintiff being an inhabitant of the parish over which the assessors who assessed him had jurisdiction to act, the effect of the two statutes of the 43 Geo. 3. c. 99. and the 43 Geo. 3. c. 161, made them the judges as to whether he was a horse-dealer or not. The case of Weaver v. Price is quite distinguishable from the present. There the plaintiff not being an inhabitant of the parish, the Justices acted entirely without jurisdiction. So also in Charleton v. Alway the plaintiff was assessed to the land-tax in respect of that for which he was not liable to be assessed at all; and the Commissioners and assessors were therefore held to have had no jurisdiction whatever to assess him, no more than if they had assessed him in respect of property not in his occupation. If it were necessary to decide the point, the decisions of the Judges hitherto have been, without exception, that under the circumstances stated in the present case the plaintiff is, in fact, a "horse-dealer."

Sir F. Thesiger, in reply.—If this had been the case of a mere "overcharge," then the plaintiff would have had no remedy by action; but his grievance is that he ought not to have been assessed at all. His case, therefore, falls within the principle laid down in Weaver v. Price and Charleton v. Alway, and not within that of The Earl of Radnor v. Reeve and Marshall v. Pitman.

PARKE, B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court should be given in favour of the defendant. It appears to me that, without the allegation that the plaintiff exercised the trade and business of a horse-dealer, the avowry discloses a complete defence to the present action; for the legislature has, in my opinion, made the judgment of the assessors final and conclusive, subject to the power of appeal—in the first place to the Commissioners, and further, if necessary, to the Judges. And reasoning à priori, it would have been very absurd if the legislature had not done so. What a flood of litigation would be the result if every one who was dissatisfied with the judgment of the assessors had a right to bring an action as soon as that judgment was enforced by the party being distrained upon for the amount of his assessment. The actions would be innumerable, and great delay would inevitably take place in the decision of questions which it is most essential should be speedily determined; and that, too, when the legislature had given a short and effectual mode of controuling the assessment of the assessor. Upon reference, however, to the words of the act, I come to the same conclusion. By virtue of the 9th section of the 43 Geo. 3. c. 99. assessors are appointed by the Commissioners, have explained to them the principles upon which they are to proceed in making their assessments, are required to verify their assessments upon oath, and are subject to a forfeiture of 20*l.* for breach of duty; and although the 9th section does not by express words enact that their assessment shall be final and conclusive, yet I find, on referring to the 30th section of the 48 Geo. 3. c. 161, which provides for cases in which parties have refused or neglected to deliver lists, it is enacted that the assessment by the assessors "shall be final and conclusive upon the person thereby charged, who shall not be at liberty to appeal therefrom" unless the ground of such refusal or neglect shall be such as the Commissioners may think reasonable. Under this section in cases where no appeal is allowed, the assessment by the assessors is final and conclusive. Now, let us look to the power of appeal given by the 24th section of the 43 Geo. 3. c. 99. That section enacts that "if any person shall think himself overcharged or overrated by any assessment or surcharge," &c., he may appeal. It has been said, in argument, that the wording of that section shews it is not meant to apply to cases where the personal liability to be rated is disputed, but only where the amount of the assessment is in question. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that that is so, the plaintiff is in the latter predicament, because it is stated in the avowry, and admitted by the case to be true, that the plaintiff was liable to "other duties amounting to 3*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, in which he was duly assessed." I am at a loss to see any difference in principle between the case of a rate-payer assessed as the keeper of six horses and one male servant, where he asserts that he only keeps five horses, and is therefore overcharged, and where he disputes the keeping of the male servant. In either case his complaint is, that he is overrated. Moreover, I think that if there were any difference, the narrow construction contended for on behalf of the plaintiff ought not to be applied to the word "overrated;" for although that word, in its strictest signification, means a rating by way of excess, and not one which ought not to have been made at all, a far wider interpretation ought to be given to it here.

The case of Weaver v. Price is quite distinguishable from the present case. In that case the plaintiff had no land at all in the parish for which the rate was made; the Justices clearly therefore had no jurisdiction to grant a warrant of distress to be levied of his goods. So with respect to the case of Charleton v. Alway. There, by the terms of the act, the overseers were bound to separate in their assessment the land-tax due in respect of property belonging to different owners; and the plaintiff having paid the assessment in respect of one portion of the property, the assessment as to the other was a perfect nullity. But the case which was tried before Lord Eldon, of The Earl of Radnor v. Reeve, is quite conclusive. There the Court said, "that it had been determined by all the Judges in England, that when a statute provides that the judgment of Commissioners appointed thereby shall be final, their decision is conclusive and cannot be questioned in any collateral way." In like manner if a statute brings a matter within the jurisdiction of the magistrates, and they have the facts before them, it is for them to adjudicate whether those facts bring the case within their jurisdiction or not; and a superior Court will not interfere. Considering, therefore, that the assessment was final and conclusive, the allegation in the avowry

"that the plaintiff did exercise the trade and business of a horse-dealer" may be struck out, and enough will remain to constitute a good defence to this action. Our judgment will be that a verdict should be entered for the defendant; or if we are asked to find a special verdict, then it will be in the words of the avowry, leaving out this immaterial allegation.

ALDERSON, B. concurred.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion. Sir Frederick Thesiger seemed to think that it was somewhat anomalous, having regard to the cases which he relied on, to hold, that where the assessor has assessed a person in respect of that to which he is not liable to be assessed, that assessment should not be allowed to be questioned in any action. Now, I think, that the effect of our judgment is not to decide that when the assessor acts without jurisdiction his assessment will bind. Take the case of the assessor assessing a person living out of his district; he would then be doing something which the statute gives him no power to do, and his assessment would not bind the person assessed; whilst on the other hand, our construction of the statute is to make his decision, subject to the right of appeal, final and conclusive upon all matters and things within the district over which he has jurisdiction to act.

PLATT, B.—I am not prepared to bind myself by the decisions which are said to have been come to by Judges, that under circumstances similar to those stated in the present case, a party has been considered to be liable to the duties imposed upon "horse-dealers." I state this that I may not be considered to have pledged myself, should the case come before me in a proper shape, as one of the Judges. But my difficulty is this, that strike out of the avowry the allegation that the plaintiff was a horse-dealer and enough remains besides to justify the act of the defendant; for I cannot but think that the fact that the plaintiff has been assessed by the assessor as a "horse-dealer," is a sufficient justification of the distress. The legislature having thought it very fitting that questions relative to the assessment to the assessed taxes should be speedily decided, have provided a machinery for that purpose; first, by an appeal to the Commissioners, and afterwards, if parties are dissatisfied, to the Judges, and, as it appears to me, have, subject to this appeal, made the assessment of the assessor conclusive. Without saying, therefore, whether the evidence in the case before me is sufficient to satisfy my mind that the plaintiff is a "horse-dealer" within the meaning of the statute, I think that the defendant is entitled to the judgment of the Court.

May. 16. } STONES v. MENHEM.*

Practice.—View by Jurors—Side-bar Rule—Irregularity.

The defendant being sued in assumpsit, for work done by the plaintiff as a carpenter and bricklayer, and for bell-hanging, painting, and papering done to the defendant's house, applied to the plaintiff to appoint a shewer on his part, for the purpose of a view by the jurors; and, on the plaintiff's refusal, obtained a side-bar rule for a view which contained the name of the defendant's shewer only, with blanks for the time and place of the meeting of the jurors:—Held, by Parke, B., that this was not a case for a view, and that the side-bar rule must be set aside. And, semble, that the rule was irregular in not containing the names of both shewers, and the time and place of the meeting of the jurors.

This was an action of assumpsit, for work done by the plaintiff, as a carpenter and bricklayer, to the defendant's house, and for bell-hanging, painting, and papering the same. The cause being at issue, the defendant, on the 8th of May, applied to the plaintiff to appoint a shewer on his part, to enable the jurors to have a view, and, on the plaintiff's refusal, served him on that day with the following side-bar rule:—

"In the Exchequer of Pleas.

"Easter term, in the 11th year of the reign of Queen Victoria.

"Monday, the 8th day } Side Bar. It is ordered of May 1848. } that a distringas for impanelling a jury shall issue in this cause, directed to the sheriff of the county of Middlesex, commanding that the aforesaid sheriff have six or more of the first twelve jurors impannelled to try the issue between the said parties, according to the form of the statute in that case made and provided, to view the place in question between the parties aforesaid, on , which said jurors shall meet at the house of known by the name of at of the clock in the noon of the same day, and there shall be refreshed at the equal charges of the parties aforesaid, and that on behalf of the said plaintiff and George Corderoy, of 98, High Street, Marylebone, surveyor, on behalf of the said defendant, shall shew the place in question and dispute between the said parties to those jurors; but no evidence shall then and there be given them thereon, in any sort, and that the same jurors who shall view the place aforesaid and appear shall before any drawing be first sworn upon the jury for the trial of this cause.

"By the Court."

The plaintiff then obtained a rule, calling upon the defendant to shew cause why this side-bar rule should not be set aside, on the grounds, first, that the case was not one in which a view ought to be granted at all; secondly, that the side-bar rule itself was defective in not containing the name of both shewers and the time and place of meeting of the jurors.

Subsequently the defendant, on the 9th and 10th of May respectively, served the plaintiff with two appointments to name a shewer, which the plaintiff declined to attend.

Cause was shewn against this rule, before Parke, B. at chambers.

Argument for the defendant.—First, the work is defective in many respects, and the nature of it cannot properly be appreciated unless the jury are permitted to have a view of the premises; and there is no reason why a rule for a view should not be granted in a case like the present, or even to inspect a house or any other goods or articles that have been sold.

[PARKE, B.—I doubt whether this is a proper case for a view. The 4 Anne, c. 16. s. 8. enacts, that where it shall appear to the Court that it will be proper and necessary that the jurors "should have the view of the messuages, lands, or place in question, in order to the better understanding of the evidence," they may order writs of distringas, &c., to issue. It does not appear to me that a view of work done to a house can be considered a view of the "place in question."] ]

The rule for a view is not confined to cases where messuages or lands only are concerned, for by a general rule of all the courts, Hilary term, 2 Will. 4. s. 63, it is ordered that "the rule for a view may in all cases be drawn up by the officer of the court on the application of the party, without affidavit or motion for that purpose."

[PARKE, B.—The effect of that rule is not to extend the law, and to allow a view to be granted in cases where it would not have been granted previously to the rule.]

Secondly, the rule is correct in point of form. It is necessary to obtain a side-bar rule before the Master will make an appointment for the purpose of naming a viewer.

Horn, contra.—The question is whether, prior to the Regulæ Generales of Hilary term, 2 Will. 4, the Courts, upon cause shewn against a rule similar to the present, would have made it absolute. It is confidently submitted that they would not. The Jury Act, 6 Geo. 4. c. 50. s. 23, uses the language of the 4 Anne, c. 16, and enacts, that the jurors are to have a "view of the place in question, in order to their better understanding the evidence," which seems to imply that a view by the jurors is confined to the case where some messuage or land is to be inspected, and the case cannot be made intelligible without such inspection. But here the view cannot be said to relate to any place in question, nor is it necessary towards the understanding of the evidence; for the state of the work can be made clear to the minds of the jury by means of the evidence of surveyors, and other practical men. It is laid down by Mr. Bagley, in his book on Practice, p. 328, that it "sometimes happens, most commonly in actions of trespass quare clausum fregit, waste and nuisance," that a view is denied; and in practice it is certainly unusual for the Court to grant a view in cases merely of work done to premises. It cannot be contended that the Court would in all cases grant a view of goods merely because they might be too bulky to be brought into court. Secondly, the side-bar rule is irregular; it ought to have contained the place and hour of the attendance of the jury, and especially the names of both shewers. The practical directions given by Mr. Bagley are, that if the opposite party refuses to name a shewer, the attorney on the other side is to get an appointment from the Master to name a shewer; that a memorandum of the rule, with the name and place of abode of the one shewer, and of the shewer nominated by the adverse party, or by the Master on his default, is to be taken to the office; and the clerk will draw up the rule. This shews that the side-bar rule ought to contain the name and abode of both shewers.

[PARKE, B.—The practice is stated in similar terms in Arch. Pract. p. 407, 6th edit.: "Draw up a precipe or memorandum of the rule you want. Get from the opposite attorney a memorandum of the name and place of abode of his shewer, and take it, together with a similar memorandum of your own shewer, and also of the time and place of meeting, &c., to one of the Masters, and draw up the rule."]

(He was then stopped.)

PARKE, B.—The rule for setting aside the side-bar rule must be absolute. The language of the acts of parliament, coupled with the practice, appear to me to shew that it is not a case in which a view ought to be granted. The necessity of a view seems to me to apply chiefly to actions of a local nature, such as trespass quare clausum fregit, nuisance, and the like. Judges are often requested to make orders for one party to be at liberty to inspect work done, and other matters; and we generally refuse, unless the opposite party will give his consent: but, according to the defendant's argument, a view by the jurors might be obtained as a matter of course. The rule will be made absolute; the costs to be costs in the cause.

Rule absolute accordingly (1).

(1) In 1 Burr. 254, Lord Mansfield says:—"Nothing can be plainer than the 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. s. 8. The Courts are not bound to grant a view of course: the act only says, 'they may order it where it shall appear to them that it will be proper and necessary.'" It is stated by Mr. Bagley, in his Practice, p. 328, that "as this proceeding is attended with considerable expense, it should not be adopted unless it be clearly necessary."

Stamp—Agreement—Statutes 55 Geo. 3. c. 184. and 7 Vict. c. 21.

An agreement, made at a time when the 55 Geo. 3. c. 184, schedule, part 1, 'Agreement,' was in force, and under which it required a stamp of 1l., was, subsequently to the 7 Vict. c. 21. coming into operation, stamped, under a penalty, with the stamp of 2s. 6d., as required by the 2nd section and schedule of the latter act:—Held, that the agreement was admissible in evidence.

Assumpsit, for money lent to the defendant by the plaintiff Hannah, whilst she was sole and unmarried, and on an account stated.

Plea—Non assumpsit.

At the trial, before Pollock, C.B., at the Middlesex sittings, after Michaelmas term last, the plaintiffs, in support of their case, gave in evidence the following document, signed by the defendant:—

“January 1, 1840.

“Miss Hannah Penniall.—I O U ten pounds, which I promise to pay you when I shall have received my legacy which my aunt shall leave me.”

The document had been stamped under a penalty with the stamp of 2s. 6d., pursuant to the 7 Vict. c. 21. s. 2, Schedule, which received the royal assent in 1844. The defendant's counsel objected to the reception of this instrument, on the ground that having been made in 1840, at which time the 55 Geo. 3. c. 184, Schedule, part 1, 'Agreement,' was in force, it required an agreement stamp of 1l. The learned Judge overruled the objection, and admitted the instrument, giving leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

Willes (April 29,) moved accordingly. —Although this document was stamped with its present stamp after the passing of the 7 Vict. c. 21, which gives a stamp of 2s. 6d., where a stamp of 1l. was necessary before, it ought to have borne the stamp which was in force at the time it was made. The stamp duty is due to the Crown as soon as the contract is entered into.

[PARKE, B.—The question is, whether the stamp duty is due to the Queen the moment an agreement is written.]

The penalty accrues as soon as the time has passed within which it might have been stamped. The Attorney General could, at that time, compel the payment of the penalty, and not allow the document to be stamped without it. The statute 37 Geo. 3. c. 136. s. 2. enacts that instruments, excepting bills of exchange, &c., unstamped, or on stamps of less than the legal value, may be duly stamped, on payment of the duty, and 10l. penalty.

[PARKE, B.—Can a debt be said to be due to the Crown at the time of the party's bringing the document to be stamped?]

The statute 23 Geo. 3. c. 58. s. 5. provides that no agreement shall be deemed to be void in case the same shall be stamped within twenty-one days after the same shall have been entered into.

POLLOCK, C.B. now said—In this case there will be no rule. In Buckworth v. Simpson (1), where an instrument which was in reality a lease, but which bore an agreement stamp for 15s., was executed in 1805, at which period the amount of the stamp on a lease, according to the act then in force, was 1l. 10s., but was stamped in 1834, under the provisions of the 37 Geo. 3. c. 136. s. 2, with a stamp of 1l., being the amount of the stamp then in force, it was decided that the proper duty had been paid. Lord Abinger, in giving judgment in that case, makes use of the expression that “the statute authorizes the demand of the duties in force at the time when the stamp is affixed.” Applying that construction to the circumstances of the present case, it follows that the instrument was properly stamped.

PARKE, B.—The same point was decided in Doe d. Dyke v. Whittingham (2).

Practice—Irregularity—Rejoining Gratis.

Rejoining gratis means rejoining within four days from the delivery of the replication without a rule for that purpose, and does not mean rejoining within twenty-four hours.

(1) 1 Cr. M. & R. 834; s.c. 4 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 104.

(2) 4 Taunt. 20.

The defendant delivered a rejoinder shortly before nine o'clock in the evening of the 29th of March, being the last day for re-joining, and also the commission day of the assizes. By the practice of the office a cause cannot be tried at the assizes, unless the record be passed before three o'clock of the afternoon of the commission day. The plaintiff, without waiting for the defendant's rejoinder (the Statute of Limitations), on the morning of the 29th inserted in the issue a rejoinder similar in substance to the defendant's, and delivered the issue with notice of trial. The defendant did not appear at the trial, and the plaintiff had a verdict:—The Court set aside the issue, Nisi Prius record, and trial.

This was a rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the issue, notice of trial, Nisi Prius record, and the trial of this cause should not be set aside with costs.

The rule had been obtained on two grounds: first, that the rejoinder on the record differed from that delivered by the defendant; secondly, that the record had been passed by the plaintiff before the delivery of the rejoinder by the defendant, and consequently before the joining of the issue.

The defendant delivered his pleas on the 20th of March, and on the 25th received a replication with a demand of a rejoinder within twenty-four hours. The defendant, who was under terms of rejoining gratis, delivered a rejoinder (the Statute of Limitations,) shortly before nine o'clock of the evening of the 29th. The cause was to be tried at Chester, the commission day for which place was on the 29th; and by the practice of the office records must be passed before three o'clock on the commission day, at which hour the office closes. The plaintiff, without waiting for the delivery of the defendant's rejoinder, on the morning of the 29th inserted a rejoinder for the defendant, made up the record for the trial, and entered the issue. The defendant's rejoinder was, "that the said debts and causes of set-off in the said last plea mentioned did arise and accrue within six years next before the commencement of this suit." The rejoinder inserted by the plaintiff was, "that the said causes of set-off and every part thereof did arise and accrue to the defendant within six years before the commencement of this suit." Notice of trial was served upon the defendant, but he did not appear at the trial, and the plaintiff had a verdict.

Martin having obtained the above rule,—Welsby and Hoggins now shewed cause.—First, there is no material variance between the two rejoinders, and the Court will not on that account set aside the proceedings. Secondly, the defendant, being under terms of rejoining gratis, ought to have delivered his rejoinder within twenty-four hours, and ought not to have taken four days. It is stated in Lush's Practice, p. 396, that rejoining gratis means rejoining without a four-day rule for that purpose, and within twenty-four hours after demand.

[ROLFE, B.—That is not so. Addis v. Anderson (1) shews that rejoining gratis means rejoining without a rule to rejoin, but that the defendant has still four days to rejoin.]

[PLATT, B.—The rule is laid down in the same manner by Mr. Tidd, in his Practice, p. 472.]

Secondly, there was not any irregularity in the manner in which the plaintiff passed the record; had he waited for the actual delivery of the rejoinder he would have been too late for the assizes.

[ROLFE, B.—What the plaintiff passed was not the record.]

It raises the same issue.

[PARKE, B.—It is not a transcript of the pleadings.]

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Issue was not joined at the time of sealing the record.]

A plaintiff may make up the issue and pass the record by anticipation, if he does it correctly.

[PARKE, B.—He has not done it correctly. He represents to the officer of the court that there is a complete issue, whereas that is not the case. The plaintiff cannot remove the difficulty, except by shewing the existence of such terms as either expressly or by implication authorised him to take the step he took.]

Martin, contra, was not called on.

On the 10th of February a fiat in bankruptcy issued against B. On the 29th of January 1844 a bill for 50l. was remitted by H. in Australia, who had no notice of the bankruptcy, to the bankrupt, and by him handed over to W. Assumpsit against the defendants as executors of Nicholas Winsland, deceased.

The declaration stated that the said Nicholas Winsland in his lifetime was indebted to the plaintiffs, as assignees, for money had and received to their use. The defendants having pleaded non assumpsit, and issue having been joined thereon, the following case was, by consent, stated for the opinion of this Court.

CASE.

In 1843, before the bankruptcy of James Hannen, R. D. Hawkins, residing at Port Adelaide, in South Australia, was indebted to the bankrupt in 771l. 3s. 4d., being the debt referred to in the letter of the said N. Winsland of the 22nd of January 1844, which debt is not yet wholly paid. In 1843 the bankrupt directed Hawkins to make his remittances on account of this debt to the bankrupt's son James Hannen, jun.

Afterwards and before the bankruptcy, viz. on the 8th of January 1844, the bankrupt bonâ fide and for a valuable consideration, by deed, assigned to the said N. Winsland the debt due from Hawkins, and all his the bankrupt's interest therein, so far as he could by deed assign the same. On the 1st of February 1844, and before the bankruptcy, N. Winsland posted in the ordinary way in which letters to New South Wales are posted, a letter to Hawkins, with the concurrence of the said bankrupt, signed by him at the foot thereof, of which said letter and concurrence the following are true copies:—"To Mr. R. D. Hawkins, Adelaide, New South Wales.—I, the undersigned, Nicholas Winsland, &c. hereby give you notice under and by virtue of a certain indenture, bearing date the 8th of January inst., and made between James Hannen therein described of the one part, and myself of the other part, certain goods or the proceeds thereof, and all monies now due or to become due from you to the said James Hannen in respect thereof, amounting to 771l. 3s. 4d., were assigned and transferred to me, the said Nicholas Winsland. And I give you further notice, and require you to make all further remittances on account of the said goods or monies to me, or to my credit at my bankers, Coutts & Co. Strand, London, whose acknowledgment will be your sufficient discharge. Dated this 22nd day of January 1844. Nicholas Winsland. Witness, John Burder, 5, Verulam Buildings, Gray's Inn, London.

The fiat issued on the 10th of February 1844. The letter could not have reached Port Adelaide by that day; and Hawkins had no notice of the assignment at the date of the fiat, nor at the date of the bill hereinafter mentioned; nor could any other letter have reached Port Adelaide on or before the 10th of February, if the same had been regularly posted on the said 8th of January 1844; nor could the said N. Winsland by any means have communicated to the said Hawkins, or have given him notice of the aforesaid assignment, or the fact of the execution of the aforesaid deed before the issuing of the said fiat or the date of the bill hereinafter mentioned. Save as aforesaid nothing had been done to prevent the debt from being in the reputed ownership of the bankrupt.

On the 29th of January 1844, a bill for 50*l.* was remitted to the bankrupt's said son James Hannen, jun. in a letter from Hawkins, which was received by the bankrupt's said son after the issuing of the fiat, and after he had notice from the said N. Winsland of the aforesaid assignment from the bankrupt. The letter stated that the inclosed bill for 50*l.* on the bank of South Australia was in favour of J. Hannen, jun., and the bill was remitted to him and received by him in pursuance of the direction aforesaid, on account of the debt due from the said R. D. Hawkins. On receiving this bill of exchange, James Hannen, jun. having been indemnified by N. Winsland, inclosed and delivered the bill to him, and the amount thereof was received by the said N. Winsland.

The Court was to be at liberty to draw any inference of fact that a jury might draw.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the assignees were entitled to recover the proceeds of the bill from the defendants as executors of the said N. Winsland. If they were, then the defendants were to withdraw their plea, and judgment by default was to be entered for the plaintiffs, with damages, 50*l.*, with interest at 5*l.* per cent. from the 16th of September 1844, by confession. If not, a nolle prosequi was to be entered.

Peacock, for the defendants (May 3).—The question is, whether on a debt having been assigned, and the assignor being unable to communicate that fact to the debtor before the bankruptcy of the creditor, the debt can be said to remain in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt, by the consent of the true owner, within the meaning of the Bankrupt Act, 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 72. (1). The debt cannot be said to have been in the order or disposition of the bankrupt, when the assignee, the true owner, did all in his power to communicate the assignment to the debtor. Burn v. Carvalho (2) is in point.

[PARKE, B.—There are several cases which decide that where the owner of goods has taken all the means in his power to express his dissent to the goods remaining in the bankrupt's hands, they are not to be considered as remaining in the order or disposition of the bankrupt.]

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Load v. Green (3) was the case of a party buying goods of others with the fraudulent intention of not paying for them, and becoming bankrupt with the goods in his possession. There we held that the goods were not, at the time of the bankruptcy, in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the plaintiffs, as the latter never did consent to the apparent ownership as such, and that at the time of the bankruptcy the bankrupt was

(1) That section is as follows:—"That if any bankrupt, at the time he becomes bankrupt, shall, by the consent and permission of the true owner thereof, have in his possession, order, or disposition any goods or chattels whereof he was reputed owner, or whereof he had taken upon him the sale, alteration or disposition as owner, the Commissioners shall have power to sell and dispose of the same for the benefit of the creditors under the commission."

the real owner, and not the plaintiffs, the sellers.]

He then referred to Fletcher v. Manning (4).

No one appearing for the plaintiffs, the Court said there must be judgment for the defendants; that the true owner of the debt, having tried all means of expressing his dissent, could not be said to have consented to the goods remaining in the order or disposition of the bankrupt.

Bramwell, who, on the former day had been absent in consequence of a professional engagement, was now (May 9) allowed to appear in behalf of the plaintiffs. — The question is, what is the meaning of the words in the 72nd section, goods and chattels in the order or disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner. They mean a permissive occupation by the bankrupt, not contrary to the consent of the true owner. The defendant's testator, Winsland, by taking a conveyance of the debt, consented to allow it to remain in the order and disposition of the bankrupt.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Your fallacy lies in assuming that the testator consented whilst he was the true owner of the debt. That is not so: as soon as he became the true owner he dissented.]

If, after goods are once vested in a buyer, there be any space of time, however short, during which they remain in the possession of the seller, and during that time the bankruptcy of the seller takes place, they pass to his assignees. In the present case there was a consent by the testator for however short a period of time, although there may afterwards have been a dissent. Suppose money is left to a woman on condition of her marrying with her guardian's consent, and that consent is given by the guardian, and the marriage takes place in a distant country, can it be said that there was no consent, because the guardian having discovered the husband to be an unworthy person, afterwards, and before the marriage, became desirous of signifying his dissent, but was prevented by distance from doing so? Here the testator had once consented to the debt remaining in the order and disposition of the bankrupt; and that is all that is necessary to make the 72nd section of the statute attach. Livesay v. Hood (5) shews that goods in the hands of a retail dealer upon sale or return, pass under a commission of bankruptcy against him, by the 21 Jac. 1. c. 19. This section of the statute has a very beneficial operation.

[PARKE, B.—In Brown v. Heathcote (6) a debtor having assigned to his creditor certain goods in two ships then at sea, together with the bills of lading and policies of insurance relating to them, and the debtor having become a bankrupt, it was held, that as everything which could shew a right to the ship and cargo had been delivered over to the creditor, the bankrupt could not be said to have the order and disposition of the goods, Your argument is, that goods at sea could not be bought at all, so as to defeat the claim of the assignees in the event of the seller becoming bankrupt. In fact it goes to this length, that no goods at a distance could be safely purchased at all. The Court, in delivering judgment in Load v. Green, cited the judgment of Lord Redesdale in Joy v. Campbell (7), as to the construction of the analogous Irish Act. That learned Judge there observes, that the statute "refers to chattels where the possession, order, and disposition is in a person who is not the owner, to whom they do not properly belong, who ought not to have them, but whom the owner permits unconscientiously, as the act supposes, to have such order and disposition." Here the debt belongs to the testator, and he has not unconscientiously allowed the bankrupt to remain in possession of it, as he could not prevent it.]

In this case there is a sufficient consent on the part of the true owner to cause the property to pass to the assignees. The fallacy on the other side is in supposing that there must be a constant and continuing state of consent. He cited Lingard v. Messiter (8) and Fletcher v. Manning.

Peacock, contra, was not called on.

POLLOCK, C.B.—It is very probable that the original bankrupt acts were not intended originally to apply to the case of debts, but merely to that visible and apparent possession of property, which is calculated to give the appearance of wealth. But since the case of Ryall v. Rolfe (9), it is too late to say that debts are not within the Bankrupt Act. The question of debts, however, does not involve the same consideration as that of goods, because a man can hardly be said to be the apparent owner of debts, and to obtain credit by means of them. The question as to debts arises chiefly with respect to assignments of debts, bonds, or policies. It has been held that where no notice of the assignment has been given, the debt remains in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, with the consent of the true owner. It may be observed that the statutes of bankruptcy passed at a period very different from the present; and that if we were now called upon for the first time to construe the acts, we should not probably concur in all the decisions that have taken place on the subject. I differ from the plaintiffs' counsel in his opinion that this statute operates beneficially in all the cases to which it is applied. For if his views were acted upon, all the transactions of commerce would be paralyzed, since nothing could be more injurious than that a sale of goods must be followed by an instantaneous delivery, on pain of their being held to be in the order and disposition of the bankrupt seller. The modern rule is, that goods are not deemed to be in the possession of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner, if the latter takes pains to obtain possession of them. The question then is, whether the true owner in the present case did consent to the goods remaining in the bankrupt's disposition: he did not, for he forthwith gave notice of the assignment to the debtor, for the purpose of defeating the transaction. The plaintiffs' counsel says that the assignee of the debt consented to its remaining in the bankrupt's hands. I cannot agree to that: the assignee took the debt with the right of claiming it instantly; and he immediately gave notice to the debtor. The result is, that the assignees of the bankrupt are not entitled to recover, and our judgment must be for the defendants.

PARKER, B.—I am of the same opinion. I quite concur with the Lord Chief Baron, that, formerly, the Bankrupt Act was not supposed to apply to debts, but merely to goods. The case of Ryall v. Rolfe, however, has decided that it applied to choses in action. The spirit of modern commerce is very different from that of ancient commerce; and if the legislature had to pass bankrupt acts in the present times they would not, in my opinion, consider it just that one party should pay his debts with the goods of others. The truth is, that, at the present day, a trader does not gain credit from the mere fact of having a warehouse full of goods; but, from his mode of dealing, and his general character. The Bankrupt Act, however, must be construed as it now stands; and then it is clear that the present case is not within its provisions. To bring the case within this part of the statute there must be a real owner distinct from the apparent owner; and to entitle the goods to be considered in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, with the consent of the true owner, the latter must consent unconscientiously to the bankrupt's remaining in possession of them. This was well explained by Lord Redesdale, in Joy v. Campbell, in construing the analogous Irish Act. In conformity with that decision, the bankrupt's assignees can claim the debt only in the event of the assignee of the debt having unconscientiously allowed it to remain in the hands of the bankrupt.

(9) 1 Ves. 348, n.c. 1 Atk. 165.

he was reputed owner," they shall pass to his assignees. Now the consent of the true owner is to be proved, and is not to be inferred from the mere fact of nothing having been done. Indeed, but for the decisions that debts are within the operation of the section in question, I should have considered the point at least doubtful whether a debt could be said to be in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, solely by reason of his being left in possession of it. But as long as the case of Ryall v. Rolle continues to be law, we are bound by that authority. Where a party leaves a chose in action in the hands of another, he is considered to leave it in the order and disposition of that other, unless he is active, and gives notice, in which case it is not in the order and disposition of the other, with the consent of the true owner.

1848. } PAVIELL v. THE EASTERN COUN-
May 11. } TIES RAILWAY COMPANY.

Arbitration—Arbitrator—Mistake as to Law—Corporation—Order of Reference not under Seal—Appointment of Attorney.

The plaintiff agreed with the defendants, by deed, to execute a portion of a railway for them at certain prices stipulated therein; and the defendants covenanted to give the plaintiff possession of certain land for the above purpose, within a specified time. The plaintiff having brought an action of debt against the defendants to recover a sum of money for extra work, rendered necessary, as he alleged, by the defendants' omission to give him possession of the land within the specified time, an order of reference was made for referring to arbitration "the claims made in the action." It was objected, before the arbitrator, that the plaintiff could not, in the present form of action, recover in respect of the extra work, his remedy being by an action for damages for a breach of covenant. The arbitrator received the evidence, and awarded a sum to the plaintiff in respect of the extra work:—Held, that as the arbitrator had not been guilty of misconduct, and had acted within his jurisdiction, his mistake in point of law was no ground for setting aside the award.

The Court refused a rule for setting aside the order of reference, on the objection that the order, being made by the defendants, who were a corporation, was not under seal, and that their attorney, who entered into it, had not been appointed under seal.

This was a motion for a rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the award made in this cause should not be set aside, under the following circumstances:—In 1841 the Eastern Counties Railway Company being about to construct a railway, entered into a contract under seal with the plaintiff, that he should execute a portion of it. The sum to be paid for a part of the work done was 29,948*l.*, and the entire work was described in drawings, plans, and specifications. The deed contained a clause that the contractor should not be entitled to charge for any alteration or addition, unless made under the sanction of a note in writing, signed by two of the directors of the company. By the deed entered into between the parties the company were bound to deliver possession of certain land to the plaintiff for the purpose of making the railway within a specified time. A portion of the work to be performed by the plaintiff consisted of an extensive embankment, the working of which was difficult and expensive, and, as the plaintiff alleged, was rendered more so by reason of the defendants' not having put him in possession of the land within the time limited by the deed. In consequence of this he made a claim upon the company of 10,307*l.* 0*s.* 1*d.*, by way of extra work, rendered necessary, as he alleged, by their neglect to give him possession of the land. Payment of this sum having been refused by the company, the plaintiff brought an action of debt for work and labour, &c. against them, to recover the above sum, together with other sums, amounting in the whole to about 15,000*l.* After the suing out of the writ, it was agreed to refer the matter to arbitration, and a Judge's order was obtained, by the terms of which, "the claims made in this action" were alone referred. On behalf of the defendants it was insisted, before the arbitrator, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in the action of debt, in respect of extra work rendered necessary by the alleged non-delivery of the land by the defendants, but that the plaintiff's remedy was by an action of damages for breach of covenant. The arbitrator received evidence of the extra work having been rendered necessary by the non-delivery of the land at the time specified, and awarded to the plaintiff the sum of 14,410*l.* 7*s.*

Martin, in support of the motion.—The arbitrator has exceeded his jurisdiction in awarding damages to the plaintiff in a case where the debt alone was referred to him, and damages could only be recovered in a special action for breach of covenant. The defendants do not contend that he has been guilty of any corruption or other misconduct.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—This is a case where the arbitrator has made a mistake in the law.]

His mistake consists in including matters not within his jurisdiction.

[PARKE, B.—Not so. He had a right to decide whether the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff or not, and he has found that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff upon a cause of action, which, in truth, was an action for damages. If, indeed, upon the face of the award he had said, that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of 10,000*l.* for not delivering up the land to him within a certain time, the award would have been void as to that; but if he makes an erroneous decision in a matter within his jurisdiction, the award ought not to be set aside.]

The submission to the arbitrator was of a debt, and the arbitrator has inserted in his award a claim which is not a debt.

[PARKE, B.—If he had inserted it knowingly, the award might have been set aside on the ground of misconduct.]

The arbitrator received the evidence after an objection to its admissibility had been made by the defendants.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The defendants might have applied to a Judge to revoke the submission.]

[PARKE, B.—The arbitrator had to decide whether the plaintiff was indebted to the defendants in a debt. He makes a mistake, and decides that that which is the subject of an action on the case is a debt. It is simply the case of an erroneous decision; and if parties choose to refer a matter to a Judge of their own selection, they are bound by his decision both in fact and in law. The fallacy lies in assuming that he has exceeded his jurisdiction. He has not done so; he has decided wrongly upon a matter within his jurisdiction.]

Martin then moved to set aside the Judge's order of reference.—The grounds of this application are, that the order of reference entered into by the defendants, who are a corporation, was not under seal, and that the attorney, who agreed to it on behalf of the defendants, was not appointed by any instrument under seal. An order of reference is a mere agreement sanctioned by a Judge, and differs from an ordinary agreement in this circumstance only, that it is capable of being enforced in a more summary way than by a mere action. It ought, therefore, to possess all the essentials of an ordinary agreement, and in the present case ought to have been under seal.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Then, according to that argument, an order of Nisi Prius for a reference in the case of a corporation ought to be under seal.]

Undoubtedly the argument must go that length.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—In that case, wherever a corporation is a party to an action, the action cannot be referred in the usual way.]

In such a case the order of reference ought to be under seal.—Again, the attorney of the company was not appointed under seal, and had no authority to refer the cause.

[PARKE, B.—The appointment of an attorney confers all the powers usually exercised by an attorney; and by usage every attorney may refer a cause in which he is appointed attorney.]

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The plaintiff may proceed to enforce the award, and the defendants may rest their defence upon these grounds. If the defendants are right, they do not require the assistance of this Court; and supposing a rule were granted, the other side might choose to have the matter settled by a court of error. We shall not interfere.]

 April 19. } DONE v. WHALLEY.

Bond—Co-Sureties—Contribution.

One of two co-sureties to a bond received from the principal a promissory note for the sum secured by the bond. In an action for contribution brought by such surety against his co-surety,—held, that it was a question of fact for the jury to say, whether the note was given in pursuance of an arrangement between the parties that the defendant should be thereby discharged, or simply as a collateral security from the principal to the plaintiff; in which latter case the defendant would not be discharged.

Assumpsit for money paid, and on an account stated.

Pleas—as to 22*l.* 15*s.* parcel, &c., payment of that sum into court; as to the residue, non assumpsit.

At the trial, which took place before Erle, J., at the last assizes for the county of Chester, it appeared, that the action was brought to recover contribution upon a bond for 250*l.*, which one Dodd had executed as principal, and the plaintiff and the defendant as sureties, and the amount of which the plaintiff had been compelled to pay. Previously to the execution of the bond, Dodd had borrowed money of a third party, giving as a security for the same a promissory note for 200*l.*, made by himself as principal and the plaintiff as surety. This note having become due, and an application for payment having been made, a sum of 250*l.* was offered to be lent to Dodd, upon the plaintiff and the defendant entering into the bond now sued on as co-sureties; but before the plaintiff would execute the bond in question, she insisted on this promissory note being delivered up, and on a fresh promissory note for 250*l.* being given by Dodd to her, which was accordingly done, and she thereupon signed the bond. There was no evidence that the defendant was aware of this arrangement between Dodd and the plaintiff.

Under these circumstances, the counsel for the defendant objected that the action would not lie; but the learned Judge overruled the objection, and left it to the jury to say, whether the plaintiff and the defendant were co-sureties for Dodd, and that if so the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

Evans now moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection.—The right of one surety to recover contribution from his co-surety is an equitable action—Cowell v. Edwards (1). Inasmuch, therefore, as the plaintiff insisted upon and received from the principal, Dodd, a promissory note for the amount of her liability upon the bond, she had no right to resort to this action for the purpose of recovering contribution from her co-surety.

[ROLFE, B.—Surely it was a question of fact upon what terms the defendant became surety; prima facie the loan having been made to Dodd, and the defendant and the plaintiff being co-sureties, the plaintiff had a remedy against the defendant for contribution.]

In the notes to Lampleigh v. Braithwaite, in Smith's Leading Cases, vol. 1. p. 71, the law is thus laid down: "On the same ground as the liability of a principal to reimburse his surety, depends the right of one surety or joint contractor who has been obliged to satisfy the whole demand, to recover a proportionable contribution from his fellow surety or contractor. He is a person who has been compelled to satisfy a demand, parcel of which his fellow was compellable to satisfy; though, indeed, if one have become surety at the instance of the other, particularly if that other have received from the principal a separate indemnity for himself, it will be different."—Turner v. Davies (2).

POLLOCK, C.B.—There ought to be no rule in this case. The simple question was, whether the promissory note for 250*l.* given by Dodd to the plaintiff, was given by him as a mere collateral security to her for the payment of the money secured by the bond, or whether there was any arrangement entered into between Dodd, the plaintiff and the defendant, by which the defendant was to be relieved from all liability upon this bond in consideration of the note being given by Dodd to the plaintiff. This was a question of fact for the jury, and they appear to me to have come to a right conclusion upon the evidence.

(2) 2 Esp. 478.

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. This only differs from the ordinary case of a co-surety to a bond given for money advanced to the principal, in the fact that a promissory note for the sum secured by the bond had been given by the principal to the plaintiff. The point, therefore, is quo animo the note was given? If there were any ground for supposing it to have been given in pursuance of an arrangement entered into between Dodd and the plaintiff, that she was to look only to him and not to the defendant at all, the defendant's counsel should have asked the Judge to leave that question to the jury. If, on the other hand, the fact was that the note was given by Dodd to the plaintiff by way of collateral security that he would repay her if she should be called upon to pay the amount of the bond that would not at all affect her right of action against the defendant. And this clearly was the effect of the evidence given at the trial.

Covenant, Construction of—Liquidated Damages—Penalty.

*The plaintiff and the defendant being attorneys and solicitors, carrying on business at Ely Place, in London, in co-partnership, dissolved the partnership by indenture, whereby the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff that he, the defendant, would not thereafter, within the next seven years, directly or indirectly, by himself or in partnership, carry on the business of an attorney or solicitor within fifty miles from Ely Place, nor interfere with, solicit, or influence the clients of the said co-partnership, and if he should infringe the covenant, then that he would immediately pay to the plaintiff 1,000*l.* as and for liquidated damages, and not by way of penalty:—Held, that the intention of the parties was, that the sum of 1,000*l.* was to be considered as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty.*

Covenant. The declaration stated the making of an indenture on the 19th of June 1841, between the defendant of the one part and the plaintiff of the other; and, after reciting that the plaintiff and the defendant were partners as attorneys and solicitors at Ely Place, in the county of Middlesex, and that the plaintiff had been applied to to dissolve the co-partnership on certain terms, witnessed that the said parties had dissolved the partnership by consent, upon certain terms therein set forth: "and the said John Strutt doth hereby covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said John Galsworthy, that he, the said John Strutt, shall not nor will at any time or times hereafter within the next seven years, directly or indirectly, either by himself or in co-partnership with another or others, carry on the said practice, profession, or business of an attorney or solicitor within the distance of fifty miles from Ely Place aforesaid, save as hereinafter mentioned, nor interfere with, solicit, or influence the clients of the said late co-partnership; and if the said John Strutt shall in any respect infringe the present covenant, then and in such case he, the said John Strutt, shall immediately thereupon pay to the said John Galsworthy, his executors or administrators, the sum of 1,000*l.* as and for liquidated damages, and not by way of penalty: provided always nevertheless, that the said John Strutt shall not be prevented from transacting any matter of business or being concerned for any person or persons not being a client or clients of the said co-partnership, and upon his remaining properly qualified as an attorney and solicitor, through or by means of the said John Galsworthy, as his agent, upon the usual terms, and upon the like charges and costs as are usually paid and allowed by attorneys and solicitors to their agents. The breaches alleged were, that the defendant had carried on the business of an attorney within fifty miles from Ely Place otherwise than through the plaintiff as his agent, and as the attorney and solicitor of one W. Smith and others, and that he had interfered with, solicited, and influenced divers persons who had been and were clients of the co-partnership, and that he had not paid the plaintiff the sum of 1,000*l.* in the indenture mentioned.

The defendant pleaded payment of 50*l.* into court, and other pleas.

At the trial, which took place before

Pollock, C.B., at the Sittings after Michaelmas term last, no evidence having been offered by either party, the jury, under the direction of the learned Judge, found a verdict for the plaintiff for 1,000*l.*, leave being reserved for the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him.

Sir J. Jervis (Attorney General,) now moved accordingly.—The sum of 1,000*l.*, stipulated to be paid for breach of contract, is a penalty, not liquidated damages. The question arises on the record. The leading case on this subject is Kemble v. Farren (1), which was confirmed by Boys v. Ancell (2), and has uniformly been cited with approbation. There the defendant had agreed with the plaintiff to act as principal comedian at Covent Garden Theatre, and the agreement contained a clause that if either party should neglect or refuse to fulfil the agreement or any part thereof, or any stipulation therein contained, he should pay 1,000*l.*, to which sum it was agreed that the damages should amount; and which sum was declared to be liquidated and ascertained damages, and not as a penalty or penal sum, or in the nature thereof. And Tindal, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, says, "That a very large sum should become immediately payable in consequence of the non-payment of a very small sum, and that the former should not be considered as a penalty appears to be a contradiction in terms." In Horner v. Flintoff (3), Parke, B. says, "Where parties say that the same ascertained sum shall be paid for the breach of every article of an agreement, however minute and unimportant, they must be considered as not meaning exactly what they say, and a contrary intention may be collected from the other parts of the agreement." The judgment of Alderson, B., in the same case, is also important.

[PARKE, B.—The learned Chief Justice, in Kemble v. Farren, considers it unreasonable to hold that if the plaintiff had neglected to make a single payment of 3*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* a day, he should become liable to the payment of 1,000*l.* In the present case the damages are incapable of exact estimation; the injury arising from the seduction of a client cannot be ascertained beforehand. This is not like the case of the payment of a small ascertained sum, as in Kemble v. Farren; and, therefore, it is reasonable in the present case to say that the parties mean what their language, taken in its obvious sense, imports, namely, that the entire amount of 1,000*l.* is to be paid.]

The result then is, that if in the present case a client had required a release to be drawn at York, and had paid the defendant 6*s.* 8*d.* for drawing it, the whole penalty of 1,000*l.* would attach.

[PARKE, B.—The plaintiff cannot estimate beforehand the damage arising from the loss of each client, and therefore stipulates for the payment of this large sum by way of liquidated damages.]

The Courts do not lay down a safe principle when they proceed on the ground of the larger or smaller amount of injury to the party.

[PARKE, B.—If the defendant sets up in business several times, or solicits clients once only, he is to pay the sum of 1,000*l.* once only and for ever.]

Boys v. Ancell is in point.

[PARKE, B.—This is a mere question of construction. A man may make an improvident bargain, but in construing his language the Courts always lean against that interpretation which would make him pay a large sum for a small matter.]

[PLATT, B.—How do you distinguish this case from Rawlinson v. Clarke (4)? There the penalty was for doing a single act, which was capable of being done in various ways.]

In that case the parties had defined the meaning of the word "practice." He referred to Beckham v. Drake (5).

PARKE, B.—I think there is no ground for a rule in this case. There is no inconsistency in supposing the parties to have meant that 1,000*l.* should be paid on a breach of this covenant. But it is clear, that the defendant is not to pay more than a single 1,000*l.* In this case the damage is incapable of an exact estimate, for the amount of injury arising to an attorney from his partner's leaving him and carrying his business to another, cannot be correctly ascertained beforehand. To avoid questions, therefore, the parties make an agreement similar to that made in Lowe v. Peers (6). It is a reasonable thing for parties to stipulate for the payment of a fixed sum, where the amount of damage is difficult to ascertain. Here, the parties have stipulated for the payment of 1,000*l*. But then it is contended, that Kemble v. Farren establishes that where a sum of money is to be paid for the violation of engagements of different degrees of importance, the sum which is stated as liquidated damages is to be considered as a penalty. No such doctrine, however, is there laid down by Tindal, C.J., but the judgment there given has been adhered to by the Courts, and does not interfere with our opinion. In that case, the question was treated by Serj. Wilde, in his argument, as one of construction only. He says, that although the sum fixed upon might appear exorbitant when applied to slight violations of the contract, yet the parties, probably, fixed it on the whole agreement, on account of the difficulty in ascertaining the damages. That is the case here; the damages cannot easily be estimated. In that case Tindal, C.J. says, "For we see nothing illegal or unreasonable in the parties by their mutual agreement settling the amount of damages uncertain in their nature at any sum upon which they may agree. In many cases, such an agreement fixes that which is almost impossible to be accurately ascertained." The law on the subject is correctly expounded in that case. Without doubt, parties may stipulate to pay as liquidated damages any amount they may agree upon. They may annex a very large sum to the violation of their agreement, but they must do so in express terms, and the Court must see clearly that they have that intention before it holds that they are liable to pay the larger amount. The rule, therefore, is correctly laid down in Kemble v. Farren, and I expressed that opinion in Horn v. Flintoff, when I said we were bound by the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Kemble v. Farren. I also used similar language in

Green v. Price. In Beckham v. Drake it was stipulated that if either party to the contract should fail to observe it, he should pay to the other 500*l*. by way of specific damages; but as the contract contained stipulations of various degrees of importance, it was only necessary to look at it with reference to all the facts to see that in that case a penalty only was recoverable and not liquidated damages. In Green v. Price, I said, "The principle is, that although the parties may have used the term 'liquidated damages,' yet if the Court can see upon the whole of the instrument taken together that there was no intention that the entire sum should be paid absolutely on non-performance of any of the stipulations of the deed, they will reject the words and consider it as being in the nature of a penalty only." My Brother Alderson there says, "But where the damage is altogether uncertain, and yet a definite sum of money is expressly made payable in respect of it, by way of liquidated damages, those words must be read in their ordinary sense, and cannot be construed to import a penalty." Here, a sum of money is to be paid by the defendant for setting up in business in opposition to the plaintiff, and the damage may be very different, according as the business is set up at the beginning or at the end of the term. The defendant is bound by this contract if it be clear; and it is clear that he stipulated to pay 1,000*l*. for the breach of any one of the conditions, and they are such that the damage arising from the violation of any of them cannot be ascertained beforehand. The whole question is one of construction only, in which it is necessary to discover the intention of the parties, or ascertain the meaning of the language they have used.

ALDERSON, B.—In this case the rule is clear, although it has not been distinctly expressed in some of the cases. It is a rule of construction, and is applied thus—where an agreement contains stipulations the breach of which produces a definite amount of damage, for which a disproportionate sum is to be paid, it is not reasonable to infer that the parties intended the whole amount to be paid. Thus, in Kemble v. Farren, the parties could not have intended that 1,000*l*. should become due on a failure to pay the sum of 3*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*. So, in Beckham

v. Drake, it was not meant that a disproportionate sum should be paid in respect of damage, which on the face of the instrument amounted to 3*l.* 3*s.* only. Under these circumstances, the Courts have construed the sum agreed to be paid to be a penalty and not liquidated damages. But where the amount of the damage that may be sustained is uncertain, it is not absurd for the parties to fix upon a definite sum to be paid in respect of a breach; and therefore, under such circumstances, it is reasonable to give their language its natural meaning. The parties are unable to define the damage beforehand, and therefore they fix it at a definite sum. In the present case the damage is undefined, for it would vary considerably if the defendant established his business forty miles from the plaintiff, or next door to him; or if he established it at the beginning of the first year or the end of the last. The parties, therefore, ascertain the damage by a fixed sum, meaning thereby to prevent the necessity of going before a jury. My observations in the case of Horner v. Flintoff were intended to apply to the case where some damages are liquidated and others unliquidated. In Kemble v. Farren, the parties had said that on non-payment of the salary of 3*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* payable to the defendant, and for the non-performance of other stipulations, the sum of 1,000*l.* should become due; and Tindal, C.J. observes, that the parties could not have meant that either should be liable to the payment of that large amount, the plaintiff if he had neglected to make a single payment of 3*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, or, on the other hand, the defendant if he had refused to conform to any usual regulation of the theatre, however minute or unimportant. The word "specifically" is used by me in Horner v. Flintoff in a correct sense. This case has been followed up by Green v. Price and Rawlinson v. Clarke, where the same principle was acted upon.

PLATT, B.—I am of the same opinion, and I concur with my Brother Parke in the limitations he has applied to this case. If the damages are uncertain and general, there is no reason to alter the words of the contract. Here, the covenant is framed to protect the plaintiff's business from being interfered with, and the parties intended that the sum specified should constitute the amount of damage. They therefore stipulate in terms, that if the contingency should occur, the sum of 1,000*l.* is to be paid as liquidated damages. I am unable to distinguish this case from that of Rawlinson v. Clarke, for here, the damages are uncertain, and might all be recoverable from a jury for aught that the Court can see to the contrary.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of the same opinion. The matter is plain, and is governed by the decided cases. Kemble v. Farren is a clear authority that where the injury is uncertain, the sum specified is to be taken as liquidated damages. Tindal, C.J. says, "But that a very large sum should become immediately payable, in consequence of the non-payment of a single small sum, and that the former should not be considered as a penalty, appears to be a contradiction in terms, the case being precisely that in which courts of equity have always relieved, and against which courts of law have in modern times attempted to relieve by directing juries to assess the real damages sustained by the breach of the agreement." The principle of the present case is included in the judgment of Tindal, C.J. in Kemble v. Farren.

except as to 23*l.*, never indebted, and as to 23*l.*, payment of that sum into court.

At the trial, which took place before Parke, B., at the London Sittings, on the 26th of April last, it appeared that the plaintiff acted as secretary to a company, of which the defendants were all members, but the contest was as to whether all the defendants were parties to the contract with the plaintiff.

The counsel for one of the defendants having addressed the jury,

Lush, as counsel for Brooke, claimed the right to address the jury also, but the learned Judge refused to allow him to do so ; and the jury eventually found a verdict for the plaintiff.

Lush now moved, on behalf of the defendant Brooke, for a new trial.—The learned Judge was wrong in refusing to allow me to be heard.

[PARKE, B.—I thought that substantially there was only one defence on the part of all the defendants, for if any one of them had not been a party to the contract with the plaintiff, the plaintiff would have failed as to all.]

If the defendants had appeared by separate attornies, and had pleaded separately, then, according to the authorities, they might, by their respective counsel, have addressed the jury—King v. Williamson (1), Massey v. Goyder (2), Ridgeway v. Philip (3). This last case was a case of partnership, and is in point with the present, except that there the defendants appeared by separate attornies, whereas in the present case they all appeared by the same attorney ; but that in principle should make no difference.

POLLOCK, C.B.—It must be always a matter for the discretion of the Judge at Nisi Prius whether he will allow more than one counsel to be heard on the part of the defendant. If, at the close of the plaintiff's case, there is only one point for the opinion of the jury, as in the present case, only one counsel should be heard. We can derive no other principle from the cases which have been cited, except that it must always be in the discretion of the Judge to allow more than one speech or not.

Practice—Judge's Order—Time to plead—Three Summonses.

A party is entitled to a Judge's order on the default of the opposite side in attending two summonses, and he ought not to obtain a third summonses.

The defendant, having obtained two Judge's summonses for time to plead, neither of which was attended by the plaintiff, on the non-attendance on the second summons, made an affidavit of service, and left it with the Judge's clerk for signature. The Judge having left chambers without signing it, the defendant, at the suggestion of the clerk, took out a third summons, returnable on the following day, when, on default of attendance, he obtained an order, previously to which, at the expiration of the time for attending the second summons, the plaintiff had signed judgment :—Held, that the judgment was regular.

This was a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why an order of Pollock, C.B., and also an order of Parke, B. should not be rescinded.

The order of the Chief Baron was to set aside the judgment signed by the plaintiff in this case ; and the order of Parke, B. was for the plaintiff to pay the defendant the costs of the application, to be taxed, on the tenth day of the then next term, if the plaintiff should not have obtained an order by that time to set aside the order of the Lord Chief Baron. It appeared that on the 9th of February the defendant's attorney obtained a summons for time to plead, returnable on the 10th, which summons was not attended by the plaintiff's attorney. On the 10th a second summons was taken out for the 11th, attendable at ten o'clock on that day. The defendant's attorney attended at the Judge's chambers, and on the summons being called on in its turn, and no one appearing on behalf of the plaintiff, he made an affidavit of service, and left it with the Judge's clerk for the purpose of obtaining the Judge's signature. The Judge, however, left without signing the affidavit. Under these circumstances, the clerk suggested that a third summons, returnable on the 12th, should be taken out. This was done, and was served upon the plaintiff's attorney, who, however, did not attend it. The defendant's attorney, on the 12th, made an affidavit of service and attendance, and having, after four o'clock on that day, obtained an order to plead several matters, delivered the pleas on the same evening. In the mean time the plaintiff had signed judgment, on the 11th of February, after the hour when the second summons became returnable.

Archbold shewed cause.—The order setting aside the judgment was correct, as the plaintiff ought not to have signed judgment before the third summons was returnable. That summons operated as a stay of proceedings until it was returnable. Formerly no order could have been obtained until after the third summons was attendable—1 Tidd's Pract. 511.

[PARKE, B.—After the second summons the defendant had the remedy in his own hands; but the case was altered after the third summons.]

[PLATT, B.—If the defendant does not take his remedy, the other side may reasonably think he does not intend to pursue that course.]

A party who is compelled to obtain a third summons has the same privilege under the present practice as he had under the former.

Lush, in support of the rule, was not called on.

PARKE, B.—The defendant ought to have had the affidavit signed, and the order drawn up on the day when the second summons was returnable. He ought not to have relied on the advice of the Judge's clerk. The judgment being regular, the rule will be absolute for setting aside the Judge's orders; but the judgment may be set aside on payment of costs by the defendant.

The declaration was framed on a special contract by the defendant to pay the deposit in consideration of the plaintiffs' allotting the shares to him.

The defendant pleaded non assumpsit and other pleas.

The cause came on for trial, at the London sittings, after Trinity term, 1847, when a verdict was by consent taken for the plaintiffs, with 126*l.* damages, subject to the opinion of this Court upon a SPECIAL CASE, which, in substance, was as follows:—

The plaintiffs as the committee of management of the above-mentioned railway, having issued a prospectus of the company, the defendant who was a silk and ribbon agent in London, on the 10th of October 1845, wrote and sent to the secretary of the company the following letter of application for shares:—

The above letter of allotment was received and kept by the defendant, but no notice was taken of it, nor was any deposit paid by him. Very few of the allottees having paid their deposits, the committee of management were prevented by want of funds from bringing the scheme before parliament.

It was agreed that the Court should be at liberty to draw the same inferences as a jury might draw.

The question for the opinion of the Court

[ALDERSON, B.—Your argument is, that the words amount to a mere caution.]

Yes. But even supposing the words "not transferable" were more than a mere notice, and were intended to restrain the allottee from transferring his bargain to a third party, yet they are not a new term in the contract, inasmuch as they do not alter the legal effect, since if they are struck out the contract between the company and the allottee is not transferable by common law.

[PARKE, B.—If the words are to be construed as a term in the contract they might prevent the allottee from transferring his equitable right to the shares; whereas his intention may have been to obtain such a contract as he could transfer.]

The argument now used on the other side was presented to the Court of Common Pleas in Wontner v. Shairp (1), and that Court appeared to attach but little value to the argument. The words "not transferable" are not to be considered as embodied in the letter of allotment. If the words bear the same meaning as "not saleable" they are inoperative, as they would not prevent the defendant from disposing of his interest.—He then argued that the words in the letter of allotment: "this letter must be produced at the time of payment," did not introduce any new term into the contract contained in the letter of application, and he cited Vollans v. Fletcher (2).

H. T. Atkinson, for the defendant, was not called upon.

PARKE, B.—The defendant is entitled to our judgment. There is in this case no binding contract. The proposal is absolute, but the acceptance in the letter of allotment is conditional. The latter contains a qualification that the contract is not to be transferable. The party purchasing this letter of allotment may have bought it thinking it was transferable, whereas the company say they will not recognize his transferee as the holder of the shares. The two stipulations are not ad idem, and therefore there is no valid contract. This appears to have been the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas in Wontner v. Shairp.

ALDERSON, B.—The letter of allotment would bear a very different value if the words "not transferable" were omitted.

A declaration by an indorser against the acceptor of a bill of exchange stated, that the bill was drawn on the 20th of September 1847, payable four months after date, and that the defendant then accepted the said bill. Plea, infancy of the defendant. It was proved that the defendant became of full age on the 24th of December 1847:—Held, that this was no evidence of the defendant's being an infant at the time of his accepting the bill.

Assumpsit by the indorser against the defendant as the acceptor of two bills of exchange. The first count of the declaration stated that W. C. J. Anstruther on the 20th of September 1847 made his bill of exchange, directed to the defendant, for the sum of 1,000*l.*, payable four months after date; that the defendant then accepted the said bill; and that the same was indorsed to the plaintiff. The second count was the same in all respects, except that the bill was for 500*l.*

Plea—Infancy of the defendant at the time of accepting the said bills.

At the trial, before Rolfe, B., at the Westminster Sittings in this term, the defendant's counsel, in support of the plea, proved that the defendant became of full age on the 24th of December 1847, and that the declaration was delivered on the 20th of March 1848. He then contended, that this evidence, coupled with the date of the bill, shewed that the bill was accepted before the defendant attained his full age. The learned Judge thought the plea was not proved, and he directed a verdict for the plaintiff, reserving leave to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him, if the Court should be of opinion that the evidence supported the plea.

Whitehurst now moved accordingly.—There was evidence for the jury in support of the plea. The bill must have been drawn four months before the 20th of March, the day of delivering the declaration; and as it is stated in the declaration that "the bill was drawn on the 20th of September, and that the defendant then accepted the said bill," that is evidence of his having accepted it before the 24th of December, the day when he is proved to have attained his majority. It was urged on behalf of the plaintiff, that it did not appear at what time the bills were drawn, but they will be assumed to have been drawn on the day on which they bear date, according to the authority of De La Courtier v. Bellamy (1), and Hague v. French (2), which shew that where a bill of exchange bears no date, it will be taken to be dated on the day when it was drawn.

[PARKE, B.—Admitting the bill to have been drawn on the day on which it bore date, why may not the defendant have accepted it some time after?]

It is stated in the declaration that the bill was drawn on the 20th of September, and that the defendant then accepted the said bill.

[PARKE, B.—That does not mean that he accepted it on that day. The averment would be proved by shewing that he accepted it on the 28th of December.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—You are attempting to push the doctrine of intendment very far. The defendant avers that he was under age at the time of accepting these bills; he is bound to make out that matter affirmatively; and all that can be said is, that his evidence leaves the point in doubt. The case may stand over for a week, to enable the defendant to move upon affidavits.

Bankruptcy—Act of Bankruptcy—Fraudulent Conveyance—6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 3.—13 Eliz. c. 5.

A deed of assignment amounting to an act of bankruptcy, under the 3rd section of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16, is not void as against the future creditors of the assignor.

This was an interpleader issue to try the right to certain goods seized by the sheriff of Middlesex under a writ of execution, upon a judgment recovered by the defendant in an action of Thompson v. Pace.

At the trial, which took place before Alderson, B., at the sittings for Middlesex, held during this term, it appeared, that on the 15th of January 1846, Pace executed a deed of assignment to the plaintiff of all his furniture, including the goods afterwards seized by the sheriff. Pace was at that time in embarrassed circumstances; and on the 21st of April a fiat in bankruptcy issued against him, the deed of assignment above mentioned being the act of bankruptcy to support the fiat. The debt of Pace to the defendant was not contracted until the latter part of the year 1847.

The learned Judge was of opinion, that inasmuch as the defendant did not become the creditor of Pace until after the execution of the deed of assignment, it could not be void as against the defendant, even although its execution might amount to an act of bankruptcy under the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 3; and subject to that direction, he left it to the jury to say whether the goods contained in the assignment were the property of the defendant. The jury found that they were; and a verdict for the defendant was accordingly entered.

E. James now moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection.—The learned Judge should have directed the jury that inasmuch as the deed of assignment amounted to an act of bankruptcy on the part of Pace it was altogether void, and that no property in these goods passed to the plaintiff. The 3rd section of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. enacts, inter alia, that any person who shall "make or cause to be made any fraudulent gift, delivery, or transfer of any of his goods or chattels with intent to defraud or delay his creditors shall be deemed to have thereby committed an act of bankruptcy." Such a deed, it is submitted, becomes of none effect, not only with respect to his present, but also with respect to his future creditors.

Per Curiam (3).—It is clear, that, under the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5, a voluntary conveyance is not void as against future creditors. It is equally clear that a conveyance fraudulent under the Bankrupt Act and an act of bankruptcy, is not necessarily fraudulent under the statute of 13 Eliz.; and there is nothing in the 3rd section of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. which can have the effect of making any deed comprised within the provisions of that section void for all purposes. Inasmuch, therefore, as the defendant did not become a creditor of Pace's until long after the deed of assignment to the plaintiff was executed, the direction of the learned Judge at the trial was perfectly right.

No writ of error lies upon a judgment of a superior court upon a feigned issue brought under the provisions of the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 71. s. 46. (the Tithe Commutation Act.)

And a writ of error having been brought upon such judgment, the Court of Exchequer Chamber ordered the writ to be quashed.

This was a feigned issue brought in the Court of Exchequer under the 46th section of the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 71. to try the plaintiff's right to the tithes of Aston-le-Walls, in the county of Northampton.

The cause came on for trial, at the Midsummer Assizes for that county in 1844, when a verdict was taken for the plaintiff by consent, subject to a special case, with liberty to turn the same into a special verdict, if allowed by law. The special case was argued, in the Exchequer, in Michaelmas term, 1845, when judgment was given for the defendant; and afterwards by virtue of a Judge's order the Nisi Prius record was amended, by inserting therein the special case as a special verdict of the jury.

A writ of error having been brought upon this judgment by the plaintiff, a rule was obtained, on behalf of the defendant, in December last, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the writ of error so brought should not be quashed.

Willes shewed cause (Feb. 5).—It will be contended, on the other side, that under the 46th section of the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 71. no writ of error lies upon the judgment of the Court below. But if that section be referred to, it will be seen that it contemplates an action being brought. It directs that such action shall be commenced by writ of summons; and it does not leave the parties to an ordinary feigned issue such as is found under the Interpleader Act, which is sent down to be tried without any writ first issuing. The section throughout calls the proceeding an action. Prima facie, therefore, this action must be subject to all the ordinary legal incidents of an action, amongst others to a writ of error.

[PATTESON, J.—Has not this point been decided? I remember that in the case of Fellowes v. Clay (1) the Judges were divided in opinion as to whether there had been a misdirection on the part of the Judge at the trial, and my Brother Coleridge withdrew his judgment, in order that the cause might go down to be tried again, when a bill of exceptions might be tendered to the ruling of the Judge. But I understood that it had been decided that no writ of error lay.]

[ERLE, J.—I was counsel in that case. It was as my Brother Patteson has stated. Lord Lyndhurst, who was then Lord Chancellor, intimated an opinion that a writ of error would not lie.]

That case never found its way into the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and the point could never have been decided judicially.

What was done, therefore, in that case ought not to prejudice the present case one way or the other. This point has arisen under the Interpleader Act, in a case of King v. Simmons (2), where the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that there could be no writ of error upon a proceeding under the Interpleader Act; but that case has gone up to the House of Lords, and their decision upon that very point is now pending. In the judgment delivered by Tindal, C.J., in that case, great stress was laid upon two points, neither of which is applicable to the present case: first, the circumstance that the Interpleader Act does not direct any writ of summons to be issued, and that a writ of error obtained without such writ would be an anomaly; and, secondly, that the 7th section of the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 58. requires the judgment upon an interpleader rule to be entered up in a special manner. But the proceedings in the present case commence by writ of summons, and the judgment entered up is that the plaintiff be in mercy and the defendant go without day. The defendant in error having entered up, and obtained such a judgment in the court below, ought to be estopped from saying that the writ of error does not lie.

[PATTERSON, J.—The words of the 46th section of the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 71. are, “that the verdict which shall be given in such action or the judgment of the Court upon the case, subject to which the same may be given, shall be final and conclusive upon all parties thereto, unless the Court wherein such action shall be brought shall set aside such verdict, and order a new trial.”]

If this case falls within the class to which those words apply, it is submitted that what is intended by them is, that the judgment of the Court shall have the finality and conclusiveness which are the usual attributes of a judgment of one of the superior courts: that is to say, final and conclusive unless reversed by a court of error; but the statute by no means intended to prevent the bringing of a writ of error. To deprive a party of his right to do so express words should have been used. But the words cited by Patterson, J. from the 46th section do not apply to a case like the present. Here the Judge, at the trial, did not direct the jury simply to find a verdict subject to a special case. There was a verdict, no doubt, found, and there was a special case directed; but the verdict was found subject to the opinion of the Court upon a special case, and further subject to the opinion of the Court of error upon a special verdict. Such special verdict has been entered upon the record, and the proceedings are taken out of the operation of the 46th section.

Watson and Pigott, contra.—No writ of error lies in this case. It is clear from the language of the 46th section of the statute, that the decision of the Court below was to be final and conclusive for all purposes. The object of the legislature was to create a machinery for raising and deciding questions concerning tithes; and although the proceeding under the 46th section is called an action, and a writ is required to issue, and an appearance may be entered, it has raised incidents which do not belong to an ordinary action. A feigned issue is required to be delivered, and the parties are required, upon the trial of the issue, to produce all books, deeds, papers and writings, terriers, maps, plans, and surveys relating to the matters in issue. The judgment which has been given by the Court below would appear to be a nullity, for the statute does not contemplate any judgment of record being entered up, but only a verdict being entered. There is no necessity for any judgment, for the costs are in the discretion of the Court. Now it is laid down in Bac. Abr., and 1 Salk. 263. is given as the authority, that “whenever a new jurisdiction is created by act of parliament, and the Court or Judge that exercises that jurisdiction acts as a Court or Judge of record, according to the course of the common law a writ of error lies on their judgment; but when they act in a summary method, in a new course, different from the common law, there a writ of error does not lie, but a certiorari.” Moreover the 46th section says, “that it shall be lawful for the Judge by whom any such action shall be tried, if he shall think fit, to direct the jury to find a verdict, subject to the opinion of the Court upon a special case; and the verdict which shall be given in any such action, or the judgment of the Court upon the case, subject to which the same may be given, shall be final, and binding upon all parties thereto, unless the Court wherein such action shall be brought shall set aside such verdict and order a new trial to be had therein, which it shall be lawful for the said Court to do, if it shall think fit." The obvious meaning of this section is, that the verdict, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the special case, shall be conclusive, except in one event, namely, that that Court shall think fit to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial. It clearly does not contemplate the reversal of the proceedings upon error. Suppose this Court should, after argument of this case, reverse the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, what would the Tithe Commissioners do? The verdict would still stand, and the Commissioners might be compelled by mandamus to act in pursuance of it.

The judgment of the Court was now (May 15) delivered by—

PATTESON, J.—This was a motion to quash a writ of error brought on a judgment of the Court of Exchequer, upon the grounds that under the circumstances a writ of error will not lie. It was a feigned issue brought under the provisions of the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 71. s. 46, in which a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to a special case, which was afterwards turned into a special verdict, and judgment given for the defendant. The statute in question provides, that a party dissatisfied with the decision of a Tithe Commissioner may cause an action to be brought, and deliver a feigned issue; that the parties shall produce all deeds, &c.; that the Judge may direct the jury to find a verdict, subject to the opinion of the Court on a special case, "and the verdict which shall be given in such action, or the judgment of the Court upon the case, subject to which the same may be given, shall be final and binding upon all parties thereto, unless the Court shall set aside such verdict, and order a new trial." It then directs, that if the facts be not disputed, a case may be stated at once for the opinion of the Court, and the decision of such Court shall be binding upon all parties concerned therein, "Provided always, that after such verdict given, and not set aside by the Court, or after such decision of the Court, the said Commissioners shall be bound by such verdict or decision, and the costs of every such action, or of stating such case, and obtaining a decision thereon, shall be in the discretion of the Court in or by which the same shall be decided, which may order the same to be taxed by the proper officer of the court, and the like execution may be had for the same as if such costs had been recovered upon a judgment of record of the same court." Nothing is said in express terms as to a special verdict; nor could it be necessary if the opinion of one Court was intended to be conclusive, because that opinion could be obtained as well on a special case as a special verdict. If the facts be undisputed, it is plain that no opportunity of removing the decision of the Court upon questions of law was meant to be afforded; nor can any reason be assigned why any distinction should be made, and that decision should be reviewed after the facts are ascertained by a jury, since the law only, and not the facts, would be submitted to a court of error upon a special verdict. Again, power is given to the Judge at the trial to direct a special case, which he cannot do at common law; and such power would seem to have no object but that of confining the decision on the law to one Court whose decision should be final and conclusive, by making the Judge, without the consent of the parties, so to shape it. Further, it should seem that the proviso as to costs shews that no judgment of record was intended to be pronounced, because it directs the costs to be in the discretion of the Court, and that they may be obtained by execution in like manner as if they had been recovered upon a judgment of record, which excludes the supposition that a judgment of record was intended to be entered up. But it is argued that as an action is to be brought, all the incidents of an action will attach, and amongst them the finding of a special verdict (which is not in terms prohibited) and a judgment thereon, and therefore that this case is distinguishable from that of a feigned issue, under the Interpleader Act, in which there is no action; and, therefore, the case of King v. Simmonds is no authority upon the present occasion, nor the case of Snook v. Mattock (3). Those cases, however, proceeded not so much on the ground that no writ was to be issued or action brought, as upon the plain intention of the legislature that no ordinary judgment of record should be entered up. We are of opinion, looking at all the provisions of the act in question, that the same plain intention of the legislature appears in the 46th section, on which this question arises, and that the same consequence follows, namely, that the legislature, intending to exclude a judgment of record in feigned issues under this act, has in effect excluded any writ of error.

We are of opinion that, whether the facts be put in the shape of a special case or a special verdict, the Court has power only to direct how that verdict shall be entered, which is made binding on the Commissioners; but that no judgment of record can be entered on which to ground a writ of error. This being so, the case of King v. Simmonds is a direct authority to shew that the proper course is for this Court to quash the writ of error, and the present rule must be made absolute.

owner, requiring repairs in a foreign port, in consequence of damage sustained by perils of the sea, the master by one bottomry bond hypothecated, for the necessary repairs, the vessel, the freight and the cargo, including the goods of the plaintiff, the shipper. The vessel and freight proving insufficient to defray the expenses of the repairs, the plaintiff was compelled to contribute towards making up the difference, and was also forced to pay certain costs incurred in an Admiralty suit, instituted by the obligee of the bottomry bond:—Held, that the ship-owner was responsible to the shipper for the costs of the Admiralty suit, and also for the value of the goods on a contract of indemnity, and that it made no difference that the goods were rendered liable by one instrument of hypothecation.

To an action on such contract the defendant pleaded that the bottomry bond was executed by the master, without any express authority from him, the defendant, and before the same was executed, the costs and expenses exceeded the value of the ship, when repaired, and the freight; that as soon as the defendant received notice of the premises he abandoned the ship and all right to her and to all freight, and refused to ratify, and never did ratify, the act of the master in executing the bond:—Held bad, on general demurrer.

Assumpsit. The first count of the declaration stated that the defendant, before and at the time of the making of the promise, &c. was owner of and interested in the possession of a certain ship called the Lord Cochrane, then being at Pernambuco, in South America, and bound from thence to Liverpool, of which said ship one L. H. Smith then was the master, duly appointed by the defendant; and that the plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the defendant, caused to be shipped and loaded on board of the said ship at Pernambuco divers goods and merchandises of him the plaintiff, of the value of 5,000*l.*, to be carried and conveyed in the said ship, by the defendant, for the plaintiff, from Pernambuco to Liverpool, and then to be delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff, the dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation only excepted, for certain freight and reward then agreed to be paid by the plaintiff to the defendant; that the said ship set sail and proceeded on her said voyage from Pernambuco to Liverpool, with the said goods and merchandises of the plaintiff and certain other cargo on board thereof, and afterwards and whilst she was so proceeding on her said voyage with the said goods and merchandises and cargo on board, the said ship struck upon a certain reef and bank in the high seas, by which said several premises the said ship became and was greatly injured and damaged, and thereupon and in consequence of the said injury and damage it became and was then deemed to be proper and necessary by the said L. H. Smith, he then being the master of the said ship and the agent of the defendant in that behalf, to put back and sail back again to Pernambuco, and to have the said injury and damage repaired, and the said ship, with the said goods and merchandises of the plaintiff and the said other cargo so on board thereof, did thereupon then put back and sail back again to Pernambuco, and the said injury and damage was then and there repaired by and under the direction and authority of the said master, and the costs and expenses then necessarily incurred at Pernambuco, in and about the repairing the said damage and injury, and in and about providing the necessary stores and victuals for the supply of the said ship and the crew thereof, and in and about making and disbursing the other payments and disbursements then properly and necessarily made and disbursed by the said master, on behalf of the defendant, at Pernambuco aforesaid, in order to have the said repairs effected, and to enable the said ship to complete the voyage from Pernambuco to Liverpool, amounted in the whole to a large sum, to wit, the sum of 7,132*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.*; that Pernambuco was in a foreign country, that is to say, in South America, and neither the defendant nor any other person interested in the said ship was then there, but on the contrary thereof were natives of, and then resident in England; and the said master, L. H. Smith, had not nor was he provided by the defendant nor any other person with money or funds to enable him to pay and defray the costs and expenses aforesaid, or to complete the said voyage from Pernambuco to Liverpool, and thereupon, being then unable to raise or borrow money by any other means, in order to obtain the said sum necessarily required by him to pay the said costs and expenses, the said L. H. Smith, then being master of the said ship, and acting as such, and within the scope of his authority, did then and there, at Pernambuco aforesaid, lawfully execute a certain bottomry bond, under his hand and seal, to the tenour and effect, that he, the said L. H. Smith, master of the barque or vessel called &c., for himself and in the name of the said defendant, was held and firmly bound unto Messrs. M'Calmont & Co., of the city of Pernambuco, merchants, in the penal sum of 10,000*l.*, for the payment of which unto the said M'Calmont & Co., the said master thereby bound himself, as well as the aforesaid owner, by those presents; and it was in and by the said bond further expressed and declared, that whereas the above-bounden L. H. Smith, for himself and owners, had taken up and received of and from the said M'Calmont & Co. the full and just sum of 7,132*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.*, being the needful repairs to, and expenses on the said barque and her cargo, and which said sum of 7,132*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* was to run on the block freight and cargo of the said barque, and to proceed from thence to the said port of Liverpool, at the rate or premium of 20*l.* per cent.: in consideration whereof, the casual risks of the seas excepted, and for the further securing of the said M'Calmont & Co., the said L. H. Smith, for himself, as well as in the name of the before-mentioned owner, did, by these presents, mortgage and assign over to the said M'Calmont & Co. her freight and cargo, &c.; and it was further declared that the said barque, her freight and cargo, were then assigned over for the security of the money taken up by the said L. H. Smith, for himself and the before-recited owner, and should be delivered to no other use or purpose whatsoever, until payment of that bond was first made with the premium that might become due thereon, and the condition of the said writings obligatory was thereunto and to each of them subscribed to be to the tenour and effect following, that is to say, that if the above-bound L. H. Smith, for himself and his said owner, should and did well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the said M'Calmont & Co. the full and just sum of 8,558*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* sterling, being the principal of that bond, together with the premium which should become due thereon, at or before the expiration of twenty days after the arrival of the said barque in the port of Liverpool, or, in case of the loss of the said barque, such an average as should have become due on the salvage, then that obligation to be void and of no effect, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue; and the plaintiff, in fact, saith that the said M'Calmont & Co. then duly advanced, lent and paid to the said L. H. Smith the said sum of 7,132*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.*, upon the security aforesaid, and on no other, and which said sum was then duly applied by the said L. H. Smith in paying and defraying the said costs and expenses so necessarily incurred at Pernambuco; that the said bottomry-bond was a valid and binding instrument, and operated by law to bind and hypothecate the said cargo on board the said ship, and amongst it the said goods and merchandises of him, the plaintiff, so shipped and loaded on board thereof as aforesaid, of all which said several premises the defendant then, &c. had notice, and thereupon, and in consideration of the said several premises aforesaid, the defendant then promised the plaintiff to indemnify and save him harmless against any loss or damage which might lawfully accrue to him, the said plaintiff, as owner of the said goods and merchandises, by or by reason of the said premises; that afterwards, to wit, on &c., the said ship again proceeded on her said voyage, and with her said cargo, and with the said goods and merchandises of the plaintiff, then being part of the said cargo, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, safely arrived at Liverpool; that the said L. H. Smith did not nor did the defendant, at or before the expiration of twenty days after the arrival of the said ship at Liverpool, or at any other time pay to the said M'Calmont & Co., or to any one on their behalf, the said sum of 8,558*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* in the said bond mentioned, or any part thereof; that by reason of the non-payment of the said sum of 8,558*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* the said M'Calmont & Co., in due form of law, to wit, on &c., took proceedings, and made suit in the Court of Admiralty, against the said ship, her freight and cargo, to recover payment of the said sum of money, and afterwards, to wit, on &c., duly obtained judgment and execution for the recovery thereof; and the costs of the said suit, amounting together to a large sum, to wit, the sum of 13,991*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*; that the value of the said ship, and of her freight and of her tackle, apparel, furniture, and appurtenances, then amounted in the whole to a less sum than the said sum of 8,558*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* in the said bond mentioned, to wit, to the sum of 3,191*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*, and that sum alone was realized to the said M'Calmont & Co., out of, and in respect thereof, whereby and by reason of which said several premises the sum of 10,000*l.* remained and was due and unpaid to the said M'Calmont & Co., upon and by virtue of the said bond and judgment; whereupon the plaintiff was forced and compelled to pay to the said M'Calmont & Co., and did then pay to the said M'Calmont & Co., as a contribution towards the said last-mentioned sum, and the interest thereon lawfully accruing, for all which he and his said goods and merchandises were then liable, the sum of 2,000*l.*, then being a less sum than the value of his said goods and merchandises, and being over and above the said freight payable in respect thereof; that the said payment and contribution, which he was so compelled to make as aforesaid, was loss and damage which lawfully accrued to him, the plaintiff, as owner of the said goods and merchandises, for and by reason of the said premises; and he, the plaintiff, also sustained further loss and damage, as owner of the said goods and merchandises, by reason of the said premises, that is to say, loss and damage to the amount of 1,000*l.* for costs, which he, the plaintiff, was forced and obliged to pay and became liable to pay as well to the said M'Calmont & Co. as his own costs necessarily and justifiably incurred by him in and about the said proceedings in the said Admiralty Court, which were so taken upon the same bond by reason of the defendant having refused to pay the said sum therein mentioned; of all which said several premises the defendant then had notice. Yet the defendant did not nor would indemnify or save harmless the plaintiff against the said loss or damage which so lawfully accrued as aforesaid to the said plaintiff as owner of the said goods and merchandises or any part or portion thereof, but wholly neglected and refused so to do, whereby, &c.

Sixth plea, that the said bottomry bond in that count mentioned was executed by the said master without any express authority from the said defendant, and that before and at the time when the same was executed by the said master at the place and under the circumstances in the said count mentioned, the amount of the costs and expenses in the said count mentioned would exceed, and in fact exceeded, the amount of what would be and was the value of the said ship when repaired as in the said count mentioned, and of all the freight which would be earned by the said ship in case she should, after being repaired as in the said count mentioned, proceed upon her said voyage and should safely arrive at Liverpool with all her cargo; that when and so soon as he received notice of the premises he did abandon the said ship and all right and title to the same and to all freight in respect of the said voyage, and did refuse to ratify and never did ratify the act of the said master in executing the said bottomry bond in the said count mentioned. Verification.

Demurrer.

Martin, for the plaintiff (June 2, 1845), in support of the demurrer.—The plea is bad. A ship-owner is bound to supply a proper ship for carrying the goods, and is liable to pay the costs of repairing the ship. That appears from the judgment of Bayley, J. in Powell v. Gudgeon (1). The master has a clear right by the general marine law to hypothecate either the ship or the cargo or both for the purpose of continuing the voyage—Freeman v. the East India Company (2). In the present case the defendant by his authorized agent pledged the plaintiff's goods, and the latter is entitled to be indemnified from the loss he has sustained.—He cited and referred to Exall v. Partridge (3), Brown v. Boorman (4), and 53 Geo. 3. c. 159.

Sir T. Wilde, contra.—It cannot be contended that the owner of a ship is liable to pay any amount of money that may be expended upon her—Carew v. White (5). A ship-owner is responsible for such repairs done to a ship by a master's orders as a prudent owner himself, if present, would order—The Alexander (6). No authority that can be given by the owner of the cargo will authorize the captain to give a bottomry bond which shall bind the owner of the ship. This bond, as far as relates to the goods, must be held to have been given by the master as agent for the owner of the goods. A ship-owner may, indeed, be liable where the vessel, being capable of repair, has been repaired, and the owner has adopted her in that state; but it is essential to notice a distinction between the case of a ship which is irreparable and one which a prudent owner would repair. When a ship is reparable the captain who repairs her may be deemed the agent of the owner of the cargo. The captain is not the agent for all the parties; but he is the agent for some parties according to their several interests, and not for all purposes.

[ALDERSON, B.—There was a case in this court (7) in which we held that the master of a vessel has authority to pledge the credit of the owner for an advance of money which was necessary for the prosecution of the voyage.]

The judgment of Sir W. Scott in the case of The Gratitude (8) is strongly in favour of the defendant's view, and seems to shew that in a case like the present the master is the agent of the shipper rather than of the owner. His language is this:—"The proposition contained in the act does not go the length of asserting universally, that the master has not a right to hypothecate his cargo in any possible case, but denies the power of the master to hypothecate it under the circumstances of this particular case. In the course of the discussion, however, the argument has been carried to the entire extent, and it has been contended that the master has no right to bind the owners of the cargo in any case—upon this ground, that although he is the agent and representative of the ship, and by virtue of that relation may bind the ship and its owners, he is not the agent of the proprietors of the cargo, and therefore cannot bind it. It is said that he is the mere depositary and common carrier, as to the cargo, and that the whole of his relation to the goods is limited to the duties and authorities of safe custody and conveyance. The position, that in no case has he a right to bind the owners of the cargo is, I think, not tenable to the extent in which it has been thrown out; for though in the ordinary state of things he is a stranger to the cargo beyond the purposes of safe custody and conveyance, yet in cases of instant and unforeseen and unprovided necessity the character of agent and supercargo is forced upon him, not by the immediate act and appointment of the owner, but by the general policy of the law—unless the law can be supposed to mean that valuable property on his hands is to be left without protection and care. It must unavoidably be admitted that in some cases he must exercise the discretion of an authorized agent over the cargo, as well in the prosecution of the voyage at sea as in intermediate ports into which he may be compelled to enter." In the present case the holder of the bottomry bond has a remedy against the ship, but not against the ship-owner.

The Court having directed a second argument, the case was again argued by Martin, for the plaintiff, and Sir F. Kelly for the defendant.

Martin (Willes with him, April 30th and May 5th), in support of the demurrer.—The language of Sir W. Scott in The Gratitude being somewhat ambiguous, has been wrested by the other side into an authority for the position that the master of the ship was the agent for the owner of the goods only. But, independently of the question of agency, the master has authority in cases of necessity to deal with the goods. Any man in the case of a fire may go into the house where the fire is raging for the purpose of preserving the goods, but such a person is not, strictly speaking, the agent of the owner of the house. The plaintiff's goods are made surety for the debt of the ship-owner, and the latter is bound to indemnify the former on the authority of Exall v. Partridge.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Sarguy v. Hobson (9) was the case of a master of a ship, who having no other means of raising money sold part of the cargo in payment of repairs.]

Secondly, the master had a right to hypothecate the cargo—The Gratitude, p. 257. The question is, whether the owner of the ship is bound to indemnify the owner of the goods whose property has been taken. The decision of Sir W. Scott as to the power of the master to hypothecate or sell the cargo, has been adopted by Lord Tenterden, in his work on Shipping, p. 371, edit. of 1847. Lord Tenterden says, in case of sale "if the ship reach the place of destination the merchant will be entitled to receive the clear value for which the goods might have been sold at that place." The authority for that position is Alers v. Tobin, at Guildhall, October 30th, 1802, before Lord Ellenborough, C.J.

[PARKE, B.—In Richardson v. Nourse (10) the captain had sold part of the cargo for repairs. The liability to indemnify proceeds on the principle, that the captain has employed part of the shipper's goods to enable him to perform his duty to others.]

He referred to Powell v. Gudgeon, Carr v. White, Abbott on Shipping, p. 118, Webster v. Seekamp, and Arthur v. Barton (11). He then contended that the declaration was good, and the plea bad, and cited Benson v. Chapman (12).

[PARKE, B. referred to Vlierboom v. Chapman (13)].

Sir F. Kelly (Barstow with him), contra.—This is a mere speculative action, and is not maintainable. The money in this case was borrowed by the master, not in his character of agent for the ship-owner, but for the benefit of the owner of the cargo, who alone is benefited. It must be admitted that where money is borrowed by the master to be laid out in repairs for the benefit of the ship-owner, and the master acts as agent of the ship-owner, the latter is liable for those contracts. But that rule does not apply to money procured by means of a bottomry bond where the sum raised exceeds the value of the ship. In such a case the master is acting as agent for some other person than the ship-owner. Where money is borrowed on a bottomry bond the ship only is pledged, and the lender must look to the ship only. The master has no authority to borrow on the credit of the owner beyond the value of the ship. In case of necessity, indeed, he is agent for all the parties concerned, acting for the benefit of each. In the case of The Gratitude, the argument was, that the master, although he was the agent of the ship-owner, was not the agent for the owner of the cargo.

[They then read a large portion of Sir W. Scott's judgment, commencing with the passage quoted by Sir T. Wilde.]

If the ship is of sufficient value to pay the money borrowed, the ship only is liable; but if it is not sufficient, then, first the freight and afterwards the owner of the cargo may be made responsible. In fact, this is not the case of a loan of money, but a pledging of the ship. The owner of the cargo derives benefit from the pledging of the vessel, and ought to bear his share of the burthen. Where the master of a vessel lying at a foreign port is compelled to sell the cargo, and can only sell it at a loss, he will be placed in great difficulty if the owner of the cargo is permitted to recover the money against the owner of the ship. The learned Judge would not have used the language he is represented to have used in the case of The Gratitude if he had thought the owner of the cargo had a remedy against the ship-owner.

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by—

POSLOCK, C.B.—This case, which is one of considerable importance, was argued for the second time in Easter term last, before my Brothers Parke, Rolfe, Platt, and myself, having been previously heard when my Brother Alderson was present. The question arises on a demurrer to a plea to the first count of a declaration in assumpsit, brought by the shipper of goods, from Pernambuco to London, against the ship-owner, to recover compensation for the loss he had sustained, the master having, in consequence of damage to the ship by perils of the seas in a foreign port, properly hypothecated for the necessary repairs the ship and also the freight and cargo, including the plaintiff's goods, by one bottomry bond; and the goods having become liable, on the deficiency of the ship and freight to pay the difference, and the plaintiff having been compelled to pay it. The facts are stated at length on the record, and made the consideration for a promise by the defendant to indemnify; and the question on the declaration is, whether these facts raise an implied, or are a good consideration for an express, promise to do so. There is a plea which states that the bottomry bond was executed by the master without the defendant's express authority, and that when so executed the costs and expenses exceeded in amount what would be the value of the ship when repaired and its freight, and that the defendant when he received notice thereof abandoned the ship and freight, and did not ratify the act of the master. But there is no doubt that notwithstanding those circumstances, the bond was valid, for it is clear that a merchant advancing money on bottomry in a foreign port, though bound to shew a reasonable case of unprovided necessity for the advance from the want of repair or otherwise, is not bound to inquire into the expediency of incurring the expense of those repairs, with reference to the interest of the owner—The Vidua (14); and on the argument, Sir F. Kelly admitted the validity of the bond. The question then is, whether, under the circumstances stated in the declaration, the defendant is responsible to the plaintiff for the sum he had been obliged to pay; and we are all clearly of opinion that he is. It is the primary duty of the master acting for the owner to do his best to convey the cargo to its place of destination in the same ship, and in case of damage to repair it. "He ought to look out for the means of accomplishing his own and his employer's contract, that is, the safe conveyance of the property intrusted to his care, and with some vehicle which he had contracted to furnish"—The Gratitude. The owner of the goods is under no obligation to contribute to any expenses except such as constitute a general average, and the repairs in this particular case do not fall under that description. To accomplish the object of repairing the vessel, the master is authorized to bind his owner, by causing the repairs to be done on his credit, in which case the tradesmen may sue the owner, or by borrowing money on his credit where that is necessary, in which case the lender has his remedy against the owner, or by selling a portion of the cargo, which is in effect borrowing from the shipper through the medium of a sale—Richardson v. Nourse; and in this case the shipper may sue the ship-owner, or the master may hypothecate part or the whole of the cargo, which gives a right to the proprietor of it to recover compensation from the owner of the vessel. All these are merely modes of raising money by the agent of the ship-owner on his account, and for his use, to enable him to do his duty by repairing the vessel, and in all the ship-owner must pay the lender. The agency to borrow by these various modes, and so to bind his employer to the lender, is cast upon the master by the necessity of the case. That the ship-owner was bound in all these cases to repay the money borrowed was not disputed by Sir F. Kelly, but he argued that the bottomry of the ship by the master made all the difference, and had the effect of limiting the responsibility of the owner to the value of the ship and freight, and that to be enforced by a remedy against the ship only. He could not contend that if there was a sale or hypothecation before or after the bottomry, the owner would not be liable for the amount borrowed by means thereof, and he was therefore obliged to limit the freedom from further responsibility to the single case where the hypothecation of the ship and cargo was effected by one instrument. For this position there is no principle, nor when properly considered any authority. The bottomry bond gives no remedy to the lender against the owner of the ship, nor against the owner of the cargo personally: the remedy is in rem, in both cases. But as between the freighter and ship-owner the cargo of the former is pledged to secure the debt of the latter; and where the former has been compelled to pay the debt through the medium of the pledge, he must be reimbursed. What difference can it make on principle, whether this liability of the ship by bottomry is by a separate instrument or by the same as that which attaches liability to the cargo? The supposed authority for this proposition, and which was mainly relied on by Sir F. Kelly, was some part of the judgment of Lord Stowell in the case of the Gratitude. The language then made use of by that eminent Judge, if taken literally, appears to sanction the notion that the master is acting merely as the agent of the shipper in hypothecating the cargo; that the hypothecation is for his benefit, and that he must bear the loss. But the judgment must be understood secundum subjectam materiam. The question in that case was, whether the act of the master in hypothecating the cargo was done by the implied authority of the shipper so as to give the pledgee a good title. This was the question in the cause; not whether that act of the master would give a remedy to the shipper against the owner of the vessel,—a question entirely beside the case; the opinion there expressed, that the master had an authority arising from the necessity of the case to bind the shipper, meaning only that he was bound as to pledgee or purchaser of the goods, whose title could not be impugned; and the pledgee was the plaintiff in that suit.

The authority which necessity gives the master to borrow for his benefit would not be effectual; no borrowing could take place through the medium of sale or hypothecation of part, or the hypothecation of all the cargo, unless a good title could thereby be given to the purchaser or pledgee. There is an agency, therefore, created by the same necessity, and given by the shipper to the master, to bind him by the sale or pledge. But the agency for the freighter is confined to cases of necessity affecting his interest, and when the sale or pledge is directly or indirectly for his benefit. It is directly beneficial when goods are damaged by the perils of the sea and sold; it is directly so where there is damage to the ship, and repairs of the ship become necessary for the benefit of the whole adventure. In all other cases where by no possibility the shipper could derive benefit, there is no implied authority from him to the master, and the act of sale or pledge would be simply wrongful. This authority from the shipper to the master to give a good title by a sale or pledge is explained and limited by Lord Stowell, in his celebrated judgment in the case of the Gratitude above referred to; and the observations on which so much stress was laid by Sir F. Kelly are to be understood as made with reference to this authority; and so understood, they do not affect the present question, which is not one between shipper and creditor. Another part of Lord Stowell's observations, as to contribution, or the sale of part, are applicable to cases of general average only, and must have been made with reference to such a case. We are all clearly of opinion that the plaintiff in this case is entitled to our judgment.

TRINITY TERM, 11 VICTORIÆ.

1848. }
June 5. } SERRELL v. ALLEN.

Contract, Construction of—Pleading—Attorney—Retainer.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff was the attorney of a certain railway company; that it was intended to apply for an act for the incorporation of the same, and that in consideration that the managing committee of the said railway would, by the permission and at the instance of the plaintiff, retain the defendant as attorney about performing certain business for the company, in preparing books of reference, serving notices on the landowners, and doing the conveyancing business consequent upon the act of parliament being obtained, if such act should be so obtained, he, the defendant, promised to allow the plaintiff one-third part of the profits of the said business. Averment, that the said managing committee did, with the permission and at the instance of the plaintiff, retain the defendant as attorney in and about the performing certain work and business for the said company, in preparing books of reference, serving notices on landowners, and were ready and willing to retain the defendant in and about the conveyancing business consequent upon the said intended act of parliament being obtained, if the said act had been obtained. Breach, non-payment of the third part of the profits:—Held, that the declaration was bad, the meaning of the contract being, that the work to be done, and not the retainer, was to be contingent upon the passing of the act of parliament.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that the plaintiff was the attorney and solicitor of, and employed by certain persons (naming them), being the committee of management of a certain railway company, of which the plaintiff had been registered as the solicitor; that it was intended to apply for and procure an act for incorporating the said company, and that the plaintiff would have obtained great gains and profits about the business of the said company; that in consideration that the said committee of management would, by and with the consent of the plaintiff and at his instance, retain the defendant as attorney and solicitor in and about the performing of certain work as such attorney and solicitor for the said company, so far as the same might concern a certain portion of the said intended railway in and about the preparing books of reference, serving notices on the landowners, and doing the conveyancing business consequent upon the said intended act of parliament being obtained, as aforesaid, if such act should be so obtained the defendant promised the plaintiff that he, the defendant, would allow him one-third part of the profits arising to the defendant from the performing by the defendant of such work and business as aforesaid, and would pay him such third part of the said profits within a reasonable time after the securing thereof to the defendant. Averment, that the said committee of management did with the consent of the plaintiff, and at his instance, "retain the defendant in and about the performing of certain" work and business as the attorney and solicitor of the said company, so far as the same apper-tained to a certain portion of the said railway, to wit, in and about the preparing books of reference, serving notices on land-owners, and doing other acts and business for the said company as such attorney and solicitor, and were ready and willing to retain the defendant to do, and in and about the doing of the conveyancing business consequent upon the said intended act of parliament being obtained, if the said act had been obtained, so far as such conveyancing business appertained to the said district, but the said act had not, in fact, up to and at the time of the commencement of this suit been obtained. [The declaration then alleged that the defendant did perform work for the company; that a large sum of money had been paid to him by the company, and that he had not paid over one-third part of the profits to the plaintiff.]

Demurrer, assigning, amongst other grounds, that the time when the said managing committee were to retain the defendant as attorney and solicitor was not alleged, and could not be ascertained with due certainty, whether it was to be made forthwith after, or within a reasonable time after, or at any time after such making of the promise.

M. Smith, in support of the demurrer.—The declaration is bad for uncertainty. The averment of performance ought to be an averment of an absolute retainer to do the work contingently upon the act passing, whereas the averment is of a contingent retainer merely; or rather it is an excuse by the plaintiff for not giving a retainer as to part, on the ground of the act not having passed. The contingency of the act passing affects not the retainer, which is to be given at all events, but the work to be done by the defendant.

Zush, for the defendant, being called on by the Court (1) to determine whether he would amend, elected to do so.

County Courts—Writ of Certiorari—
9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 90.

(1) Pollock, C.B., Alderson, B., Rolfe, B. and Platt, B.

Vict. c. 95. s. 90, upon an ex parte application, if the Judge, in the exercise of his discretion, thinks it proper to grant leave without notice to the other party.

In this case a rule had been obtained to set aside a certiorari issued, pursuant to leave granted by Platt, B., to remove a cause from the County Court of Oxford.

The affidavits on both sides shewed that a plaint was levied in the County Court of Oxford by the plaintiff, a horse-dealer, at Oxford, to recover 13*l.* for the hire of horses and gigs, supplied to the defendant whilst resident in the university as an undergraduate. The defendant gave notice, under the 76th section of the Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, that he intended to set up, by way of defence, his infancy. On the evening of the 23rd of May the plaintiff served the defendant with notice, pursuant to the 70th section, that he meant to try the cause by a jury on the 26th. The 24th being Her Majesty's birthday, no Judge was at chambers on that day; but on the morning of the 25th the defendant, on the ground that a question as to what are necessities for an infant could not be fairly tried by an Oxford jury, obtained leave from Platt, B., under the 90th section, to issue a writ of certiorari. No notice of the application was given to the plaintiff, and the proceedings at chambers were entirely ex parte. The writ of certiorari was served on the morning of the 26th, before the trial came on. The rule was obtained on the ground that a Judge has no authority to give leave to issue a writ under the 90th section unless the other party has notice of the proceeding, so that he may be heard if he pleases.

Whateley and Barstow shewed cause (June 14).

[Per Curiam.—We are satisfied that, under the circumstances, there was sufficient ground for issuing the writ, and that there was a sufficient reason for dispensing with notice to the other party if the Judge had power to dispense with it under any circumstances.]

The sole question, then, is whether the Judge could legally allow the writ to issue on an ex parte application. That depends on the construction of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 90, which enacts "that no plaint entered in any court holden under this act shall be removed or removable from the said court into any of Her Majesty's superior courts of record by any writ or process, unless the debt or damage claimed shall exceed 5*l.*, and then only by leave of a Judge of one of the said superior courts, in cases which shall appear to the Judge fit to be tried in one of the superior courts, and upon such terms as to payment of costs, giving security for debt or costs, or such other terms, as he shall think fit." If a construction is put upon this enactment rendering it necessary to give the other party notice in all cases, the act would often be inoperative. In the present case it was barely possible to serve the certiorari in time; and if the plaintiff had been levied in a county court in a remote part of the country it would have been impossible; and it would manifestly have been practically impossible in the present case to find the plaintiff (who might, perhaps, keep out of the way) in time to give notice of the application to the Judge, and then to obtain the writ in the space of two days, one of which was a holiday. An ex parte application may be prima facie suspicious, and the Judge, in the exercise of his discretion, may require it to be explained why the other side had no notice; but there is nothing in the act imperatively requiring notice to the other side, and convenience and analogy shew that it is not requisite in all cases. The writ of certiorari at common law is a writ of right—Landons v. Shiel (1), and, like all writs of right, issues ex parte: so is the habeas corpus cum causa to remove a cause from the Palace Court: even a writ of capias, which affects the liberty of the subject, issues ex parte. The words and meaning of the act enlarge the Judge's power by giving him authority to fetter the issuing of the writ by such terms as he pleases, and do not clog the discretion of the Judge by insisting upon notice.

Keating, in support of the rule.—The enactment requires the Judge to exercise a discretion on the terms on which the writ is to issue. These terms may affect the plaintiff's interest; for instance, in the present case the plaintiff has, in consequence of this writ, thrown away the costs of the proceedings in the court below, and there may be cases in which he would be more seriously affected. It is contrary to all principle that a Judge should decide ex parte conclusively on any matter without hearing both sides.

[ALDERSON, B.—The question is, whether the enactment gives the Judge a discretion which he will do well to exercise in general by hearing both sides, but which he may under special circumstances exercise without that which is in general desirable, or whether notice is indispensable. The wording of the section seems to give a general power to remove a plaintiff above 5*l.*, and then adds a restriction, that it must be by leave of a Judge.]

And of a Judge exercising a discretion, which he cannot duly exercise without hearing both parties.

POLLOCK, C.B. now (June 15) delivered the judgment of the Court.—We think this rule should be discharged. The question depends upon the true construction of the 90th section of the Small Debts Act. [His Lordship read the section.] The question is, whether the latter words, "as he shall think fit," necessarily import that the Judge should have both parties before him in order that he may be in a situation to exercise his discretion. We are all of opinion that this is not so, and that the writ may issue ex parte if the Judge is satisfied that it ought to do so.

In general, the writ of certiorari is the right of the subject at common law, and though it is taken away in many cases by different acts of parliament we think the analogy of common law ought to be followed; and as at common law the application for a writ of certiorari is always ex parte, we think that the authority of the Judge, or rather the right of the subject, should not be taken away without express words.

The enactment here is not framed to fetter the power of the Judge, but to give him additional power. He may inquire into all the circumstances and clog the issuing of the writ by such terms as he thinks fit. This he may do without having the other party before him. There are neither express words nor necessary reasons to limit the power of the Judge. The rule must therefore be discharged, and as it is an appeal from the decision of a Judge, not in consequence of any intimation of his, it must be discharged with costs.

1848. { PLATELL v. BEVILL.
May 2, 5, 31. { JACOBS v. HYDE.

Insolvent—Order for Protection—7 & 8 Vict. c. 96—5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. s. 10—Pleading—Plea in bar.

A final order obtained by an insolvent under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. constitutes an absolute bar to an action for the debt as to which it is a protection.

To an action of debt the defendant pleaded that after the accruing of the debt, and after the passing of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, and before the passing of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, and before the commencement of the suit, &c., a petition for protection from process was duly presented by the defendant to the Court of Bankruptcy, and afterwards filed therein; and that thereupon and after the passing of the secondly-mentioned act, a final order for protection and distribution was made in the matter of the petition by a Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy; and that the debt accrued before the filing of the petition:—Held, that the plea was good both in form and substance.

Debt. The declaration contained only the money counts.

Plea—That after the accruing of the said debts and causes of action in the said declaration mentioned, and after the passing of an act of parliament passed in a session of parliament held in the 5th and 6th years of the reign of Her present Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled 'An Act for the relief of insolvent debtors,' and before the passing of a certain other act of parliament passed in a session of parliament held in the 7th and 8th years of the reign of her said Majesty, intituled 'An Act to amend the law of insolvency, bankruptcy and execution,' and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the 22nd day of July, A.D. 1844, a petition for the protection of the defendant from process was duly, and according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, presented by the defendant to Her Majesty's Court of Bankruptcy, and afterwards, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, filed in the said court, and thereupon afterwards, and before the commencement of this suit, and after the passing of the said secondly-mentioned act, to wit, on the 26th day of September 1844, a final order for protection and distribution was made in the matter of the said petition by Joshua Evans, Esq., a Commissioner of the said Court of Bankruptcy, duly authorized in that behalf. That the said several debts and causes of action in the declaration mentioned, and each and every of them and every part thereof, accrued before the date of the said filing of the said petition in the said Court of Bankruptcy. Verification.

Special demurrer upon the ground that the plea was not in the form authorized by the statute; that the proceeding of the Court in the matter of the said petition and the final order of the Commissioner were not averred in the plea to have been entered of record; that the plea did not shew that the first order was signed by the Commissioner; that the plea should have shewn who was protected by the order, and what was thereby ordered to be distributed; that the plea ought to have shewn the form of the order; that after the passing of the statute of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, the Commissioner had no power to make an order which would be a bar to the action.

Butt, for the plaintiff (May 5).—First, this plea is bad in substance. It has been decided in Toomer v. Gingell (1) that an order for protection, made under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, protects the person of the insolvent only from process. Maule, J. in that case observes, that that statute does not make the order for protection a plea in bar. Secondly, if the Court should think that the 10th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. is still in force, and that the plea in effect states an order made under that section, the plea is bad in form upon the grounds specially stated in the demurrer—Lewis v. Harris (2), Gillon v. Deare (3), Cook v. Henson (4), Tyler v. Shinton (5).

Ring, who appeared for the defendant, was not called upon.

[PARKE, B.—We all think that under the authority of Cook v. Henson this plea is in form sufficient. The other point we will consider.]

In the case of Jacobs v. Hyde, which was also an action of debt, and in which the plea was similar in substance to the above, the plaintiff had replied "that a final order for protection and distribution was not made modo et formâ; whereon issue was joined."

At the trial, before Pollock, C.B., at the London Sittings after Hilary term, 1847, the defendant put in evidence in support of his plea, an order for protection made under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. The learned Judge was of opinion that this was an order protecting the person of the defendant only, and that the plea was therefore not proved.

A rule for a new trial on the ground of misdirection having been obtained,—

Humfrey and Hunter shewed cause (May 2), relying on the case of Toomer v. Gingell.

Hake, contra.—The plea is drawn in the words of the 10th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. and discloses a final order; stating it not in terms, but according to the legal effect imparted to it by the statute. The order is in terms a protection to the person only; and does not purport either to vest the insolvent's estate in assignees or to distribute it, but both these effects issue upon the passing of it (sect. 7), and the distribution of the future estate is to take place under the direction of the Court (sect. 12). If the final order shall be refused, the 10th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. divests the estate out of the official assignee, and reverts it in the petitioner. The order is, therefore, a cause of effecting a distribution as much as if it had purported on the face of it to be an order for distribution. The plea in Toomer v. Gingell was bad for not stating that the defendant's property was liable to distribution, but that case is no authority for the plaintiff in this case. The observations, indeed, of Maule, J. in that case are in favour of the plaintiff's view, but those observations were extrajudicial and cannot be supported. It clearly was not the intention of the legislature to repeal the 10th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, for by sect. 30. of the subsequent act, the legislature expressly reserves to the insolvent "every benefit and protection" in respect to his debts which were afforded "in the recited act and in this act," and by sect. 74. it is enacted that nothing in the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. "shall be construed to repeal, affect, or in any manner alter the provisions of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. except so far as is expressly provided, or except so far as the provisions of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. may be inconsistent with or at variance with the provisions of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96." These acts, therefore, should be construed as one act; and the result is, that an order for protection made under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. has the effect of an order made under the 60th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, and distributes the estate of the insolvent as well as protects his person.

The judgment of the Court (6) in Platell v. Beville, was now (May 31) delivered by—

ROLFE, B.—[After stating the pleadings, his Lordship proceeded]:—In the course of the argument the Court intimated its opinion that the plea was sufficient in form, and stated all that by the statute of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. s. 10. was required to constitute a good defence. The only remaining question was, whether the final order, obtained under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, constitutes an absolute bar to an action for the debts as to which it is a protection, or operates only as a protection to the person of the insolvent; in which latter case it ought not to be pleaded as an absolute bar, but specially in bar of execution against the person only. We are of opinion that it is an absolute bar, and consequently our judgment must be for the defendant. We have to construe the provisions of two acts of parliament, which are by no means clearly expressed, especially the latter, the wording of which, particularly of the form given in the schedule for the order of protection, is likely to mislead the reader; but on a careful consideration of the clauses of both acts, we think the intention of the legislature is sufficiently plain, and that there is no difference in the legal effect of the final order given under the second, from that given under the first act, as to the discharge of the insolvent. In both, we are of opinion that it constitutes an absolute bar to the actions in respect of which it is a protection, as it is admitted it did under the first act. The last act terms the final order as one made "under the provisions of the said act, as amended by this act" (sect. 22). The section then proceeds to define from what debts the person is to be protected (adopting the language of the old Insolvent Act, 7 Geo. 4. c. 5. s. 46), and directs the form in the schedule to be followed: but the power of making the final order arises from the former act, and its effect is the same as under the former act, except so far as it is varied by the latter. Section 74. of the latter act directs that nothing therein contained shall be construed to repeal, affect, or in any manner alter the provisions of the 5 & 6 Vict. "except so far as herein expressly provided, and except so far as the provisions of the said recited act may be inconsistent with, or at variance with the provisions of this act." Now the last act does make certain express alterations; it provides a more easy way of petitioning for the protection from process in the first instance (which petition is still to be under the former act), for it dispenses with notice in the Gazette, &c. It also provides for the appointment of the creditors' assignee, and the vesting of the estate in him by the appointment prior to, or at least independently of the final order, whereas, under the former act, the creditors' assignee had not the estate vested in him until the final order, which, by sect. 4, was to be for the protection of the person of the insolvent, and vesting the estate in the creditors' assignee, and also in the official assignee, to be named by the Commissioner. An alteration is made in the effect of the assignment to the official or creditors' assignee, by section 11, by vesting powers in them, and by section 19, by vesting in them goods in the apparent ownership of the insolvent; but with respect to property acquired after the final order, no alteration seems to have been made. By the first act, on the passing of the final order, all the estate, present and future, of the insolvent vests in the assignee, as under a fiat; but then by sect. 9, the assignees must file a claim, in order to take after-acquired effects, and cannot take possession but by an order from the Commissioner, or the Court of Review, so that both sections being read together, it seems that the assignees take all present property absolutely, and have a right to obtain all that is subsequently acquired by the insolvent. This is the only way of reconciling these contradictory clauses. The 4th section, explained by the 73rd section, leaves no doubt on this question, under the second act; for the appointment vests the property of the insolvent; that is, all present and future estate which shall come to him before he shall have obtained the final order, leaving all subsequently-acquired property to be dealt with under the former act; for the 9th section of that act is certainly not repealed. In our view, the rights of the assignees to after-acquired property are the same under both acts. The alterations above noticed, and others, are made by the 7 & 8 Vict.; but that statute makes no alterations in the effect of the order as a defence, at least no express alterations; and it leaves the 10th section, which gives the defence, unrepealed. Nor is there any enactment in the new statute which is inconsistent with the provision that the final order should constitute a sufficient plea in bar; and, therefore, by the 7th section, that provision must be in full force. If the former act had vested all subsequently-acquired property in the assignees, and the latter act had altered this, there would have been ground for the implication that the legislature meant to do away with the absolute defence given by the 10th section, and to leave the creditors to take the remedies against subsequently-acquired property by fieri facias. But we think the rights of the assignees to after-acquired property are not affected, and, consequently, that such implication does not arise; and there is, therefore, no inconsistency or variance between the first and second act, in this respect, to authorize us to reject the 10th section as being impliedly repealed by the new act. The form given by the schedule, it is true, protects expressly the person only; and the giving such a form is, no doubt, an incautious mode of legislating, and is calculated to mislead; but then the final order, directed by the first act, is no more than an order of protection of the person. Section 4th says the order shall be called a final order, and shall be for the protection of the person from process, and for vesting of the estate, which latter operation is now otherwise provided for; but its effect as a measure of protection is only in terms for the protection of the person ; not a word is directed to be introduced that imports any protection but that of the person in the order itself. The privilege of pleading it in bar arises entirely from the 10th section, which describes the legal effect of such an order as "an order for protection and distribution,"—a very inaccurate expression, no doubt, for there is nothing in the order, as required by the first act in general terms, and particularly directed in the schedule to the second act, which takes notice of a distribution, or requires it. The final order, under the second act, is not an order for distribution, but neither was the final order required by the first act ; and if the 10th section allows the order to be pleaded in inapposite terms, the same direction must be followed as to that required by the second, and it may also be pleaded in the same inapposite terms. Considering the two acts together as one system, we see no reason to suppose that the legislature, which clearly meant to give facilities to the debtor to obtain his discharge, intended also to limit the operation of that discharge under the new act, all his property, present and future, being disposed of for the benefit of creditors in the same way in both acts. We think that the legal effect of the discharge is the same in both acts, and that the effect artificially described in the 10th section belongs just as much to an order under the second as under the first act. This view of the two acts differs from that which my Brother Maule is reported to have taken in the case of Toomer v. Gingell. The question in that case was not fully argued ; the learned counsel for the defendant having, after taking time, acted upon the impression as to the meaning of the second act, which its language is, at first sight, so likely to create, and abandoned the argument. Upon the best consideration we can give to these acts, we think that the impression was a wrong one, and that the effect of the final order is the same under both acts.

(6) Pollock, C.B., Alderson, B., Rolfe, B., and Platt, B.

His Lordship then said :—The case of Jacobs v. Hyde is decided by this, and in that case the rule must be absolute.

RIDLEY v. THE PLYMOUTH, DEVON AND STONEHOUSE BAKING AND GRINDING COMPANY.

In an action ex contractu against a joint-stock company, completely registered under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, the plaintiff must prove that the contract was made by persons having authority from all the shareholders to bind them by such a contract ; and this may be done by proving that the contract was sanctioned by the persons authorized by the deed of the company to conduct the affairs of the company. The plaintiff is not confined to proof of authority conferred by the deed, if he can in any other way shew that the whole of the shareholders have mediate or directly given authority to those making the contract to bind them ; but it is not enough to shew that the contract was made or sanctioned by some of the directors, without proving that by the deed or otherwise the shareholders had authorized that number to act for them.

Therefore, where the deed of a company appointed eleven directors and declared that five should be a quorum, the company were held not to be bound by contracts made at a board meeting by three only of the directors.

If a contract be made or sanctioned by a competent number of the governing body, in such a manner that it would bind the company if only a partnership at common law, it binds it, though completely registered under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110 ; for the 44th section, which enacts that contracts in the absence of certain requisites shall be void and ineffectual, also prohibits the company from taking the objection of the absence of these requisites.

The company cannot therefore object that a contract is not in writing, signed by two directors, and under the seal of the company, or signed by an officer of the company, but it may object that the persons making the contract had no authority at all to bind the whole shareholders.

Semble—That acts and admissions by a competent number of the governing body of the company are admissible as evidence against the company, and have the same legal effect as if made by the company itself, and, consequently, that a verbal statement made by the chairman, at a board meeting of the directors, to the plaintiff, that a distress made on his goods had been rightfully made by the landlord of the company, and that the company were bound by a contract made with the plaintiff in their name, to indemnify him against it, would have operated as a ratification of the contract with the plaintiff, and have been original evidence of the rightfulness of the distress (without producing or accounting for the absence of the lease to the company, under which the rent distrained for became due though shewn to be in writing), if there had been a competent number of the directors present at the board meeting, when the statement was made.

These were actions of assumpsit. In that of Ridley v. the Plymouth, Devon and Stonehouse Baking and Grinding Company, the declaration contained a count for money paid; and the defendants had pleaded non assumpsit (1).

In that of The Kingsbridge Mill Company v. the same defendants, the declaration was for goods sold and delivered, to which the defendants pleaded non assumpsit.

At the trial, before Wightman, J., at the Exeter Spring Assizes, 1848, it appeared that the first of these actions was brought to recover a sum of money paid to redeem the plaintiff's goods, which had been taken under a distress by the landlord of premises demised by him to the company, and by them sublet to the plaintiff. It was proved by the returns that the defendants were a completely-registered company, and that there were eleven directors, whose names appeared on the return. The plaintiff then proved that he entered on the premises under a written agreement, purporting to be made and signed by one Lord as secretary for the company, and that his goods were afterwards seized as a distress for rent by the head landlord. The plaintiff then called Lord, who proved that, at the time he signed the agreement, he was acting as secretary for the company, but was not formally appointed till afterwards. He also proved that, after the distress was made, the plaintiff came to a board meeting of the directors, and had a conversation with the chairman. It was objected that he could not be asked what passed, as the admissions of the chairman were not evidence against the company. The learned Judge permitted the question to be asked. The witness then proved a conversation amounting in effect to a complete recognition of the contract with the plaintiff, and an admission of his whole case. On cross-examination it appeared that the lease to the company was in writing; and that there were only three directors present at this meeting; and that in fact never more than three directors had acted together. The counsel for the defendants objected that the company, being a corporation, could not be bound by a contract not under seal; or at all events that the plaintiff was bound to prove affirmatively that the persons making this contract had power to bind the shareholders, and therefore ought to put in the deed of the company; and that the admissions of the directors were no evidence of the terms of the tenancy of the company, which required to be proved by the writing, to shew that the distress was lawful. [There were other objections, which it is not necessary to notice as the judgment of the Court in banc did not turn on them.] Finally, the defendants put in the deed of the company as their own evidence, the plaintiff's counsel objecting that it was not evidence against him. By the deed it appeared that five directors were required to form a quorum.

The same facts are applicable to the second action, which was brought to recover the price of a quantity of flour sold and delivered to the defendants.

In both cases the learned Judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, with leave for the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for them.

Rules having been obtained accordingly, cause was shewn in the first case by—

Crowder and Greenwood.—A company registered under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. is only a corporation quodammodo, and for particular purposes. The language of the 25th section is very peculiar: "The shareholders shall be and are hereby incorporated as from the date of such certificate, by the name of the company, as set forth in the deed of settlement, and for the purpose of carrying on the trade or business for which the company was formed, but only according to the provisions of this act and of such deed as aforesaid, and for the purpose of suing and being sued, and of taking and enjoying the property and effects of the said company." And the preamble shews that this was advisedly done, for the purpose of investing these companies with the incidents of corporations, with modifications. The manner in which these companies shall contract, is pointed out in the 44th section, by which it is enacted that "every contract (with some exceptions that do not touch this case) shall be in writing, and signed by two at least of the directors of the company, on whose behalf the same shall be entered into, and shall be sealed with the common seal thereof, or signed by some officer of the company on its behalf, to be thereunto expressly authorized by some minute or resolution of the board of directors applying to the particular case; and that, in the absence of such requisites, or any of them, such contract shall be void and ineffectual, except as against the company on whose behalf the same shall have been made." This contract, it may be, would be void, if the company sought to enforce it, because of the absence of the requisites; yet it is good as against the company. The exception seems to have been put into the act in order to deprive the company of the power of setting aside a contract for the want of requisites which it lies in the power of the company to affix or not.

(1) The pleadings in this action were special, but it is unnecessary to notice them, as all the points on which the Court expressed an opinion arose on the general issue to the count for money paid.

[PARKE, B.—But how do you get over the fact that Lord was not secretary at the time he signed the agreement? And what do you say to the objection that the company could not be shewn to be liable to indemnify the plaintiff, except by putting in evidence the written agreement between the company and their landlord to shew that the landlord's distress was rightful?]

Both objections are answered by the evidence of Lord as to what took place at the board meeting when the chairman spoke for the board to the plaintiff, and admitted the validity of the contract, and that the distress was lawful, and the company bound to indemnify the plaintiff. That was a ratification of the contract made by Lord with the plaintiff, and an admission by the company of the effect of the agreement between them and their landlord, and was original evidence of it.—Slatterie v. Pooley (2). The objection made at the trial was, that the company could not make admissions except under seal, and that this conversation was not evidence at all against them.

[PARKE, B.—There certainly was ample evidence of a confirmation at that time, if the persons present had power to bind the company. It must be conceded that it is not every shareholder of the company that has power to bind them, and how do you shew this board had such power? The other point comes round to the same thing; viz. had the board, who made the admissions, power to bind the company?]

The whole management of a joint-stock company is committed to the directors. The act, by section 25, "empowers and requires the company to appoint, for the conduct and superintendence of the execution of the affairs of the company, not less than three directors." Each, therefore, of the directors has ostensibly the full authority of a managing partner to conduct and superintend the affairs of the company, or, at all events, three have such power. The plaintiff is not cognizant of the deed, which may limit a director's powers as between himself and his partners, but cannot affect the rights of third persons dealing bond fide.

Butt and Collyer, in support of the rule.—This contract, at least, was beyond the power of any number of the directors, for the company was never formed as a company to lease lands and indemnify tenants; but it is not necessary to argue that point. The authority given to the directors is given by the deed, and the deed should have been put in evidence by the plaintiff, to shew what that authority was. There should, therefore, have been a nonsuit on the weakness of the plaintiff's case. The deed was put in evidence by the defendants, and shewed that five was a quorum, and that the three who made or sanctioned this contract had no authority. There should, therefore, be a verdict for the defendants.

PARKE, B.—I think the rule must be made absolute. I am now satisfied that a contract may bind a company of this sort, though it is not under seal; and that the exception in the 44th section, though it is curiously worded, has the effect of making the want of the formalities an objection that does not lie in the mouth of the company. The company cannot object that those who have made a contract on its behalf, have not made it in the formal manner pointed out in the 44th section, for the words of the section prevent it from doing so; but it may still object that they had no authority to make contracts on behalf of the company at all. In an ordinary partnership, each individual partner has, by the common law and usage of trade, power to bind all his co-partners. But the same rule does not apply to joint-stock companies; and the question is, who have authority to bind them? That must depend upon the terms of the deed of partnership, or upon usage. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. s. 7. provides that a copy of the deed shall be deposited for the purpose of registering the same. Every person, therefore, who deals with a registered joint-stock company, has it in his power to ascertain at the registry what are the contents of the deed, and what are the powers of the directors, and who have authority from the shareholders, under the deed, to bind them; but a person who seeks to make the company liable is not confined to proving his case by the deed. He must shew that the contract was made by persons having the authority of the shareholders to bind them, which he may do, either by proving the deed, and shewing that the authority given in it has been pursued, or by shewing that the whole of the shareholders have, by usage or otherwise, sanctioned these persons in entering into contracts not sanctioned in the deed. The plaintiff here failed in proving this. With respect to the subscription of the agreement being by a person, who, at the time, was not secretary, I think the agreement would have been binding on the company, if it had been proved that a competent number of the directors had afterwards sanctioned and confirmed it, but the proof failed in that.

PLATT, B.—I am of the same opinion. Had there been a contract under seal, it would have bound the company; but that not being proved, it was necessary to shew that a contract was entered into by a number of the governing body competent to bind the company. That was not proved.

Rule absolute to enter a nonsuit.

In the second case—

Crowder appeared to shew cause, and submitted that the defendants must be held liable for goods actually consumed by them in the course of their trade, on their premises.

[PLATT, B.—That is a fallacy. The company consist of many persons who may never be near the premises, and who do not consume goods, or contract for them, or know anything about them except through their agents. A man may very well trust five directors with power to trade for him, and yet decline to trust a smaller number. Have you, in this case, any proof that the body of the company, or a competent number of the directors, ordered or sanctioned the ordering of this flour?]

PARKE, B.—The company consists of many members, perhaps 400 or 500, each of whom is liable on a judgment against the company. The plaintiff is to shew that all of these members are bound to pay for this flour. The persons who ordered the flour are personally liable for it, unless it be shewn that the company directly or indirectly sanctioned the act. If you can shew a recognition of the contracts by a quorum of directors, or an account stated with them, or an authority given by five directors to the person who actually ordered the flour, it may do; but if it be like the last case, you cannot get at the shareholders except through the deed; and the deed gives authority to five directors, not to three.

Venue, Change of—Material Evidence.

Proof of anything directly affecting the amount of damages is material evidence within the meaning of the ordinary undertaking on bringing back the venue.

This was an action on the case, for negligence by the defendants, in Merioneth, whereby the plaintiff's arm was broken; and the declaration alleged, as special damage, that thereby the plaintiff was not able to pursue his profession of attorney at Dolgelly in Merioneth.

Plea—Not guilty.

The venue had been originally, Middlesex; it had been removed to Merioneth, and brought back to Middlesex, on the usual undertaking to give material evidence in Middlesex.

At the trial, before Parke, B., the only evidence in Middlesex given was the roll on which the plaintiff was admitted as an attorney. A verdict was found for the plaintiff, with leave for the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that this was no compliance with the undertaking.

Martin now moved accordingly.—The allegation on the record of special damage makes no difference, for there was no proof of any damage arising from his being an attorney: it was left to inference, and might have been inferred as well without any allegation on the record.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Still the damages are part of the issue; and this was evidence of the damages, material in one sense, though perhaps not within the meaning of the undertaking, unless that includes all relevant evidence.]

[PARKE, B.—I should like to consider whether, in order to recover damages, in respect of his loss of practice as an attorney, it was necessary to prove the roll.]

Not at all; it is quite immaterial whether he was an admitted attorney or not. If he did practise in fact, the defendant, a wrong doer, could not set up that he was not on the roll. It is, therefore, not material evidence. The case which is most against the defendant is Greenway v. Titchmarsh (1), but there the evidence was of a payment which formed a part of the damage: here it is beside the question.

[ALDERSON, B.—If the attorney was not admitted, he could not compel his clients to pay him; and the practice, therefore, which he lost would be of less value.]

[PARKE, B.—You cannot get out of that:

it directly affects the quantum of damages, and, therefore, is material evidence; though I thought at the trial, and still think, it goes to the very verge of the rule.]

Per Curiam—

Rule refused.

1848. }
June 16. } MURRAY v. MANN.

Fraud—Principal and Agent—Money had and received.

Any false statement knowingly made for the purpose of inducing a party to enter into a contract is fraud in law.

Fraud in one contracting party does not render the contract void, but only defeasible at the option of the other contracting party.

Money had and received by an agent under such a defeasible contract, ceases to be had and received to the use of the principal when the contract is defeated; and the agent may shew this as a defence against the principal, though the fraud was entirely his, and the principal was innocent of it.

This was an action of debt. There was a plea of set-off for money had and received. (The remainder of the pleadings are not material.)

At the trial, before Parke, B., at the Middlesex Sittings, in this term, it appeared that the plaintiff as agent for the defendant sold and delivered a horse warranting it free from vice, and received the price from the purchaser. The horse was not free from vice and was returned with the defendant's sanction, and the money repaid to the purchaser by the plaintiff before the action commenced. This sum of money was the subject of the set-off.

The learned Judge in summing up told the jury that the question depended upon whether the money was rightfully repaid by the plaintiff. His Lordship said that on the sale of a specific chattel the property passed, and that the purchaser had no right to return the horse on account of a breach of warranty, unless there was a term to that effect in the contract (which in the present case there was not), or the contract was induced by fraud, or the seller agreed to take the horse back. He left it to the jury, therefore, to say whether, in the present case the defendant had sanctioned the taking back of the horse, of which there was ample evidence, or, if not, whether the contract of sale was induced by fraud, telling them that in either case they must find for the plaintiff on the question of set-off; and that if the plaintiff at the time he made the contract of sale knew that the warranty was false, and concealed his knowledge from the purchaser, it was fraud sufficient to give the purchaser a right to set aside the contract. The jury found for the plaintiff; and now

Humfrey moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection.—He submitted that the Judge ought not to have told the jury that the sale with a warranty which the vendor knew was false was fraudulent as a matter of law, but merely to have left it to the jury as a fact from which they could infer fraud. And he also contended that inasmuch as there was no evidence that the defendant, the principal in the sale, had any knowledge of the falsehood, the fraud must be taken to be exclusively the fraud of the plaintiff, the agent, and that the guilty agent would not now be permitted to set up his own fraud as a defence to the innocent principal's claim.

[PARKE, B.—The defendant claims this money as his by virtue of a contract made by his agent. That contract is defeasible in consequence of fraud. In Cornfoot v. Fowke (1), the majority of the Court held, that fraud on the part of an agent would enable the other contracting party to avoid the contract as against the principal, who was innocent of any fraud in a criminal sense, though civilly responsible for the fraud of his agent. Here, the purchaser exercised the option which he had and set aside the contract, and the money ceased to belong to the defendant. I thought that no action for money had and received would lie on his part after the contract was avoided, even assuming that the fraud was exclusively that of the agent.]

Suppose that the agent had actually paid the money over to the principal, and that then the purchaser had recovered back the money from the agent who made the contract with him on account of a fraud of the agent's, could the agent then have recovered it from his principal? He could never be permitted to come into a court of justice and set up his own fraud as a ground of action against an innocent person.

[PARKE, B.—A court of justice will not permit a party to set up his own fraud in order to enforce a fraudulent contract: but is that applicable to a collateral fraud? I think the agent might in the case you suppose recover the money as paid on a consideration that had failed, but it is not necessary to decide that now.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—There must be no rule. It is difficult to say what can be fraud at a sale, if making a false representation knowingly for the purpose of obtaining a higher price is not. As to the other point, the defendant claims the money as his by virtue of a contract. The plaintiff says that the contract was defeasible in consequence of his fraud, and that it has been defeated. The money, therefore, does not belong to the defendant. The plaintiff may refuse to pay it to him, or, if he has paid it, he may recover it back.

PLATT, B.—I concur. The defendant, if he adopts the plaintiff's act, must adopt it altogether. He cannot say, I adopt your contract so far as to make the money mine, but I do not adopt your contract in so far as it was by your fraud defeasible; he must adopt it wholly or not at all. If that were not so he would keep both horse and price, for the property of the horse is clearly in him, inasmuch as the purchaser has defeated the contract that took it out of him.

PARKE, B.—I agree on both points. In summing up I was desirous of laying down the law accurately to the jury; and therefore, although there was ample evidence of the defendant's assent to the plaintiff's taking back the horse, and consequently to returning the price, I told them that unless there was such an assent, the purchaser was not entitled to return the horse on account of a breach of the warranty, unless there was a condition in the contract to that effect, or unless there was fraud entitling the purchaser to avoid the contract. That was settled to be the law in the case of the sale of a specific chattel in Street v. Blay (2). I explained to the jury what was fraud, and in defining it to them I told them that if the warranty that the horse was free from vice was made to induce the purchaser to alter his condition by entering into the contract, and was false within the knowledge of him who made it, it was fraud. If this was wrong, there should be a new trial. There have been many cases in which the distinction between moral and legal fraud has been considered. One of the most curious occurred when I was a Judge of the King's Bench—Polhill v. Walter (3). There the defendant accepted a bill by procuration, when he had, in fact, no authority to do so, and knew he had none, but it was done with very honest intentions. Still it was untrue that he had authority to accept, and it was held that telling an untruth knowingly for the purpose of inducing another to alter his position was legal fraud. But no such distinction arises here. The falsehood was told to obtain a better price for the horse; and surely a lie told by a person for the purpose of obtaining a pecuniary benefit is fraud in every sense, moral and legal. The other point on which there is more doubt was not discussed at the trial, but it passed through my mind, and I answered it as has been done to-day. The plaintiff is not seeking to deprive the defendant of money that would be his unless he set up his fraud. He shews that in consequence of the fraud the money did not become the defendant's. The money was as it were in a state of deposit whilst the contract remained defeasible, for it cannot be too often repeated that fraud does not render a contract void, but only voidable at the option of the other party. When the purchaser here thought fit to avoid the contract the money ceased to be money had and received to the use of the defendant, and the set-off failed.

NEW SERIES, XVII.—EXCHEQ.

(2) 2 B. & Ad. 456.

1848. } FREEMAN AND ANOTHER v.
June 21. } EDWARDS AND TWO OTHERS.

Grant—Rent-charge—Mortgage—Lien on Goods—Trespass.

A rent-charge, with a power of distress, cannot be created except by a grant binding some legal interest in the land, and ceases to exist when the same person, who is owner of the rent, becomes entitled to the whole legal estate in the land out of which it issues.

(3) 3 B. & Ad. 114; s. c. 1 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 92.

The interest of a mortgagor in possession is not a legal estate at all, and consequently cannot support a rent-charge with powers of distress.

A grant, purporting to be the grant of a rent-charge, with powers to distrain, made by a person having no legal estate in the land, may operate as an irrevocable licence by the grantor to seize such goods as may be on the land at the time the grantee seizes, and to treat them as a distress, and may therefore justify the seizure of the goods of the grantor himself, and give the grantee an interest in them after seizure; but it does not give any interest in the goods of the grantor before seizure, and does not justify the seizure of the goods of third persons at all.

Therefore, in an action of trespass de bonis asportatis by the assignees of a bankrupt, a plea setting forth an indenture of mortgage of copyholds in fee, by which the mortgagor granted that the mortgages might distrain for the arrears of interest; and averring a surrender and admission of the mortgagee in pursuance of it, and justifying the seizure of the goods on the premises, whilst still in the possession of the bankrupt, but after bankruptcy as a distress, was held bad after verdict; and the plaintiffs had judgment non obstante verdicto.

This was an action of trespass, by the plaintiffs, as assignees of John Leedham, a bankrupt, for seizing goods belonging to the plaintiffs, as assignees.

[There were several pleas, on which issues were joined, which it is unnecessary to notice.]

The defendants pleaded, thirdly, that before the time when, &c., and before and at the time of the making of the indenture thereafter mentioned, and before the said John Leedham became bankrupt, the said John Leedham was seised in his demesne as of fee, at the will of the lord of the manor of Wakefield, in the county of York, according to the custom of the said manor, of certain customary tenements and messuages, demisable by copy of court roll of the said manor, and being so seised, and before the said time when, &c., and before the said John Leedham became bankrupt, by a certain indenture then made between the said John Leedham of the one part, and the defendants, Henry Lees Edwards and William Busfield, of the other part, he, the said John Leedham, in pursuance of a certain therein-mentioned agreement, and in consideration of the sum of 1,400*l.* sterling, to him, the said John Leedham, paid and advanced by the said H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield, upon the execution of the said indenture, did, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said defendants, H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, that he, the said John Leedham, his heirs or assigns, and also Nancy, the wife of him, the said John Leedham, for the purpose of releasing all claim and title to free-bench, and all other necessary parties should and would forthwith well and effectually surrender, pass, and give up into the hands of the lord of the manor of Wakefield, in the said county of York, according to the custom of that manor, amongst divers other messuages or tenements, a certain messuage, dwelling-house, or tenement, commonly called or known by the name or sign of the Queen's Head Inn, together with a certain brew-house, kitchen, stable, shop, and outbuildings adjoining and belonging, with the appurtenances, situate respectively in the parish of Halifax, in the county of York, to the use and behoof of the said defendants, H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield, their heirs and assigns for ever, to be holden of the lord of the said manor by the rents, suits, and services in respect of the same premises due and of right accustomed, subject nevertheless to a certain proviso for redemption of the said premises in the said indenture contained. And the said John Leedham did, in and by the said indenture, covenant and agree to and with the said H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield that he, the said John Leedham, should and would well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the said H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield the principal sum of 1,400*l.* with interest for the same, after the rate of 4*l.* 10*s.* for 100*l.* for a year, on the 23rd of June next ensuing the making of the said indenture without any deduction or abatement on any account whatsoever. And for the better payment of the interest of the said sum of 1,400*l.*, the said John Leedham "did in and by the said indenture grant unto the said H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield, that as often as it should happen that the said interest should be in arrear, in the whole or any part, for the space of twenty-eight days after the 23rd of June or the 23rd of December in any year during the continuance of the security of the said indenture, it should be lawful for the said defendants, H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield, into and upon the said messuages or tenements, hereditaments, and premises hereinbefore covenanted to be surrendered, or into or upon any part thereof, in the name of the whole, to enter and distrain for the same interest and the arrears thereof;" and the distress or distresses then and there found to impound, and in pound to detain, and in due time to appraise and dispose of the same according to the due course of law, in the same manner in all respects as landlords are authorized to do in respect of distresses for arrears of rent reserved upon leases for years, to the intent that the said H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield should thereby be paid and satisfied all arrears of the said interest, and all costs occasioned by the non-payment thereof, as by the said indenture, reference being thereunto had, will, amongst other things, more fully appear.

The plea then averred, that the said John Leedham being so seised of the said customary messuages and tenements, with the appurtenances, he, the said John Leedham, and also Nancy his said wife, for the considerations aforesaid, and in pursuance of the aforesaid covenant, afterwards and before the said times when, &c., and before the said John Leedham became bankrupt, at a general court of the lord of the said manor of Wakefield, according to the custom of the said manor, to wit, in open court there, surrendered the said customary messuages and tenements, with the appurtenances, to the use of the said defendants, H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield, their heirs and assigns, to the intent that they might be admitted tenants of the said premises, all which said premises being copyhold were then and there at the said court, to wit, by copy of court rolls, granted unto the said H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield, to hold to them, their heirs and assigns for ever, subject, nevertheless, to the proviso or agreement for redemption thereof contained in the hereinbefore mentioned indenture, and with, under, and subject to the powers, provisos, declarations and agreements comprised therein, and according to the purport, intent and meaning of the said indenture, to be holden of the lord of the said manor by the rents, suits and services according to the custom thereof. And the defendants, H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield, were then and there at the same court admitted, to wit, by copy of court roll, tenants of the said messuages and tenements, according to the form and effect of the said surrender, and according to the custom of the said manor.

The plea then averred, that after the making of the said indenture and surrender, and after the admittance of the said defendants, H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield, as aforesaid, and whilst the said sum of 1,400*l.* remained due and owing upon the said security and during the continuance of the said security of the said indenture, and whilst the said power of distress was in full force and virtue, and before the said time when, &c., 3*l.* 10*s.* of the interest aforesaid, at the rate aforesaid, of the said sum of 1,400*l.* for one half year, was due and unpaid from the said John Leedham to the said defendants, H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield, and continued so due and unpaid for more than twenty-eight days next following, whereupon the said defendants, H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield, in their own right, and the defendant, the said Thomas Hilliwell, as the servant and bailiff of them, the said H. L. Edwards and W. Busfield, and by their command, at the said time when, &c., in the declaration mentioned, under and by virtue of the said power of distress so granted as aforesaid, and of the said stipulations in the said indenture contained in that behalf, entered into the said messuage or dwelling-house, brew-house, kitchen, stable, shop, and out-buildings, being in the possession of the said John Leedham, to distrain for the said half year's interest so due and in arrear as aforesaid, and did then and there distrain the said goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned, the same being then in and upon the said premises, and being subject to such distress as and for a distress for the said sum of 3*l.* 10*s.* so in arrear from the said John Leedham as aforesaid, which are the supposed trespasses whereof the plaintiffs above complained.

The plaintiffs replied by traversing the possession of Leedham at the time of the distress, on which issue was joined, and on this issue the verdict was for the defendants.

All the other issues were found for the plaintiffs.

Knowles having obtained a rule nisi to enter judgment non obstante veredicto for the plaintiffs, on the ground that the plea confessed the trespasses without justifying them,—

Martin and Cowling now shewed cause.—The effect of the grant, contained in the indenture and set out in the plea, is to create a rent-charge, and make the distress lawfull. In Littleton, s. 221, it is said, "Also if one make a deed in this manner, that if A. of B. be not yearly payed at the feast of Christmasse for terme of his life xx. s. of lawfull money, that then it shall be lawfull for the said A. of B. to distreyn for this in the mannor of F. &c., this is a good rent-charge; because the mannor is charged with the rent by way of distress. And yet the person of him which makes such deed is discharged in this case of an action of an annuitie, because he doth not grant by his deed any annuitie to the said A. of B, but granteth only that he may distreine for such annuitie," &c. And in the commentary on that section Co. Litt. 146, b. Lord Coke says, "And yet no rent is expressly granted out of the manor; but by the grant that he shall distrain for such a yearly sum of money in judgment of law the manor is charged with the rent." Johnson v. Falkner (1) was also cited on this point; it makes no difference that the estate here is copyhold, for a rent may be created out of lands of any tenure, or however small the estate may be—Saffery v. Elgood (2), Co. Litt. 147.

[PARKE, B.—But here, after the grant, there is a surrender, and the mortgagee is admitted to the whole estate. How can the rent-charge continue to affect the estate after it has become the estate of the grantee?

(2) 1 Ad. & El. 191; s. c. 3 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 151.

In order to simplify the question, suppose that the lands were freehold, and that after the creation of a rent-charge the estate was conveyed to the grantee, would not the rent-charge be extinguished?]

It is the practice of conveyancers to rely on such clauses of distress in mortgages, and the Court will not overthrow their practice unless compelled to do so by some rigid rule of law. There is no such rule of law; for the reason why a conveyance of the estate, charged with a rent-charge to the grantee, destroys the rent-charge is, that it merges. But there never is a merger of an interest by the operation of the same instrument which creates it; for the law, in order to effectuate the intention of the parties, will so marshal and construe the instrument as to prevent the interest from being destroyed as soon as it exists. In order to give an operation to such a grant in a mortgage in fee, the Court will construe the deed to mean that the mortgagor shall retain possession and have a legal estate out of which the rent may issue. It clearly was the intention of the parties to this deed that the surrender should not destroy the power of distress, and that Leedham should, whilst he retained possession, have an estate to support the rent-charge. Why should not a rent-charge issue out of an equity of redemption in possession?

[PARKE, B.—A mortgagor in possession is not a tenant to the mortgagee: there was a case in which it was said that the mortgagor was in the relation of tenant to the mortgagee, but that case has been generally disapproved of. If, indeed, there was any part of the mortgage deed amounting to an agreement that Leedham should hold the possession as tenant to the mortgagee, that would create a tenancy; but here the utmost effect of your argument is, that the parties contemplated that Leedham should, after the admittance, continue to occupy as mortgagor: that creates no estate on which the grant can operate so as to create a rent-charge, for the possession of a mortgagor is, in law, no estate at all.]

[PLATT, B.—That must be so, for the mortgagee may bring ejectment, and lay the demise on a former day. If the mortgagor had any estate, however precarious, the demise should be laid after it was determined.]

[ALDERSON, B. referred to the notes to Keech v. Hall (3).]

[PARKE, B.—Have you any case in which it has been held that a rent-charge and the fee simple in possession could co-exist in the same person?]

It must be admitted that no such case has been found; but, at all events, this operates as a covenant for a valuable consideration, giving a licence to seize the goods; and being irrecoverable by the bankrupt himself, it is not revoked by his bankruptcy—Hawthorn v. the Newcastle-upon-Tyne and North Shields Railway Company (4).

Knowles (Addison with him), in support of the rule.—The deed had its full operation by creating a rent-charge, which existed from the time of the deed till it was destroyed by the admittance of the grantee, and therefore it does not operate as a covenant or licence afterwards; but even if it did, such a licence is personal, and does not bind the goods—Howes v. Ball (5).—(He was then stopped by the Court.)

PARKE, B. — The assignees acquire all the property of the bankrupt, but subject to such equities as attach on the goods at the time of the bankruptcy. The utmost effect that can be given to this deed is to consider it as operating as a covenant that the mortgagees may seize such goods of the mortgagor as shall be on the premises at the time the distress is made, and treat them as if distrained. Such a covenant would not affect any specific goods before seizure, and, therefore, the goods came to the assignees not subject to any equity. Probably, the argument that the grant operated so as to create a rent-charge is correct; and if so, the rent-charge continued until the surrender and admittance. But it is not necessary to decide that, for as soon as the grantee of the rent-charge, if it was one, became entitled to the fee simple in possession, the rent-charge was gone, and the covenant ceased to exist as an obligation binding the land. It might, however, still exist as a personal covenant, binding the covenantor, though it would not affect third persons. The argument of the plaintiff's counsel that the effect of the deed was exhausted by the creation of the rent may make this doubtful; and it is not necessary to decide it, for, giving the covenant this effect, it will not make this a good plea. The covenant, at most, is to be construed as an agreement that all goods belonging to Leedham, at the time of the distress and then upon the land, might be seized. This would affect his own goods when seized. Up to the seizure, the whole is contingent, and gives no lien on specific goods. Before the distress was made Leedham became bankrupt; at that time the whole of the goods which were his property and then upon the land, were contingently liable to be seized, but no specific portion was liable more than the rest. There was, therefore, no lien on any portion of the goods according to the principle of the decision in Carvalho v. Burn (6). Then, at the moment of the distress, the goods had ceased to belong to Leedham, and became the property of the assignees, and, as goods not belonging to the covenantor, were not subject to the covenant. This is decisive of the case. The plea being bad in substance, and confessing without avoiding the cause of action in the declaration, there must be judgment non obstante veredicto for the plaintiffs.

1848. } ELLIOTT v. THE SOUTH DEVON
June 28. } RAILWAY COMPANY.

*New Trial — Misdirection — Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20.
s. 11.—“Town.”*

If a Judge in leaving to the jury a question partly depending upon the construction of an act of parliament, does not give the jury an explanation of the meaning of the act sufficiently comprehensive to enable them to decide the particular issue, it is a misdirection.

Therefore, where the issue was whether a railway was at a particular spot passing “through a town within the meaning of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, section

(6) 4 B. & Ad. 382; affirmed in error, 1 Ad. & El. 883.

11,” and the Judge merely told the jury that “town” was in the act to be understood in its ordinary sense, the Court granted a new trial.

“Town” in the act means the space on which the inhabitants have permanently collected their dwellings so near to each other that they may be reasonably said to be contiguous. It includes all open spaces surrounded by a continuous line of houses; and, semble, all open spaces occupied as mere accessories to the congregated dwelling-houses, although not so surrounded.

This was an issue directed by the Vice Chancellor of England, to try whether the South Devon Railway in passing over land of which the plaintiff was the owner and occupier, was passing through a town within the meaning of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. s. 11, which enacts, that “in making the railway it shall not be lawful for the company to deviate from the levels of the said railway, as referred to the common datum line described in the section approved of by parliament, and as marked on the same, to any extent exceeding in any place five feet, or in passing through a town, village, street, or land continuously built upon two feet, without the previous consent in writing of the owners and occupiers of the land in which such deviation is intended to be made.”

At the trial, before Wightman, J., at the Exeter Spring Assizes, 1848, it appeared that the plaintiff was the owner and occupier of some fields that a few years ago were unquestionably in the country. The town of Plymouth has been for some time rapidly increasing, and the land up to the plaintiff's was now covered with houses, so that his land on three sides was bounded by streets and houses now beyond all controversy town. On the fourth side the plaintiff's land was bounded by building land not yet actually built upon. The roads for some way beyond the plaintiff's land were lighted, paved, and watched by the authorities of Plymouth. The plaintiff's land, though likely to be built over very soon, and of great value as building land, was still used as pasture land.

By the Vice Chancellor's order, it was admitted, that the South Devon Railway, in passing over land of which the plaintiff was the owner and occupier, had deviated from the level as referred to the datum line more than two and less than five feet, without the plaintiff's consent.

Wightman, J. told the jury that the word "town" as used in the act was to be understood in its ordinary and popular sense; that it was for them to decide where the town ended and the country began; and that the lighting, &c. was a circumstance, not a test. The jury found that the railway on the plaintiff's land was passing through a town within the meaning of the act.

A rule having been obtained calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why there should not be a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, on the part of the learned Judge, in not properly explaining to the jury the term "town,"—

Cockburn and M. Smith now shewed cause.—"Town" is not confined to land covered with houses; it may well extend to land like the plaintiff's, though still green fields.

[ALDERSON, B.—Certainly, a railway passing along St. James's Park or through the Temple Gardens would, in every sense of the word, be passing through a town, though it would be passing along land never built upon. But the Judge, one would think, ought in leaving to the jury a question on the construction of an act of parliament to give them some guide. Should he not have told them what was the idea of a town within the meaning of the act?]

He did enough when he told the jury that it was to be understood in the ordinary and popular sense of the word. Had there been any part of the act that controuled the meaning of the word and gave it a different sense, it is conceded the Judge should have told them so; but when the word has its ordinary meaning the jury are as capable of understanding it as the Court. The jury know what the word "town" means, and the Judge could only have defined it by using equivalent terms, which the jury would no more be bound to understand than the original word "town."

[ROLFE, B.—The case is somewhat analogous to Baddeley v. Gingell (1), where we had to determine what houses were "within the street." But where the terms used in a statute are so difficult to apply, the Judge should give the jury a guide. It certainly would be no misdirection if he were to define "town" in a way which would be very inaccurate as applied to other circumstances, if it was accurate as far as related to the circumstances to which the jury were to apply it; but I think it is a misdirection to give no definition at all.]

[PLATT, B.—If a railway were passing over Primrose Hill would it be passing through town or not? That seems very near indeed to the facts. How should the question be left to the jury in that case?]

[ALDERSON, B.—A few years ago a railway passing over Primrose Hill would not have been passing through the town; I think, now, as a jurymen, I should say it was. But if a place like Primrose Hill was not town before certain streets were built, and becomes town after they are built, though itself untouched, a reason must exist why the building of these streets should make the difference. To that extent the Judge should define the word "town." He should tell the jury in what state the surrounding land must be before the place ceases to be in the country.]

Kinglake, Serj., in support of the rule.—The word "town" in the act is coupled with "village, street, or land continuously built upon." It means, therefore, something different from these, and the Judge ought to have told the jury what it meant. No doubt it means, in the act, something differing from the legal definition of "town," given in Co. Litt., p. 115 b, where it is said that a place cannot be a town, in law, unless it hath, or in time past hath had, a church, and celebration of Divine service, sacraments and burials. It is no answer to say that a definition would have been difficult; there was the more reason to direct the jury. The railway here does not touch a single house or cross a street till after it has left the plaintiff's land; and it is submitted that the Judge should at least have told the jury that the railway was not passing through the town till it entered the space on which the inhabitants have permanently collected their dwellings. That direction would have given the defendants a verdict, though if the action had been concerning St. James's Park or Primrose Hill, the jury would probably find the fact to be that the railway had entered the space on which the inhabitants have permanently collected.

PARKE, B.—I think that there must be a new trial. The learned Judge was certainly not bound to give a complete definition of the word "town," embracing every possible case, yet he should have given the jury a definition sufficiently comprehensive and accurate to be a guide to enable them to decide the particular question before them, which was, whether the railway in passing over these fields was passing through a town within the meaning of the 11th section. The word "town" in the act does not mean a town in the legal sense of the word,—a place with a constable, or a church, but a town in the sense of the space where the dwelling-houses of the inhabitants are contiguous; it means the space covered by the collected mass of houses. The question then is, could the railway be brought over the fields in question, without coming through the contiguous dwelling-houses? A space, though not built upon, may be part of the town, if surrounded by continuous houses, as, for instance, the green part of Grosvenor Square. So long then as the railway continues in the fields, without entering the continuous line of houses, it is not passing through the town; but when it has entered the continuous mass of houses, it continues to pass through the town till it passes out across the continuous line of houses on the other side. I do not mean by the continuous line that the houses are to be touching each other, but the line where the houses are so near that, in a rough and popular sense of the word, they may be called continuous.

ALDERSON, B.—I think so too. What the wall was to towns, in ancient times, the continuous line of buildings is now as a boundary. By continuous I do not mean touching, but so near that the inhabitants may reasonably be said to dwell together. When the railway passes this boundary it begins to pass through the town.

ROLFE, B.—I think there should be a new trial, because the learned Judge did not give a definition sufficient for the decision of the particular case. He was not bound to give a definition embracing every case. Even that given by my Brother Parke, which at first struck me as perfect, is not complete. There are in foreign towns what they call a "place,"—a parallelogram of ground, with houses on three sides only, cultivated and adorned for the sake of these houses, but opening, on the fourth side, into the country; such a spot would not be within my Brother Parke's definition, yet I think it would be town.

PLATT, B.—I concur in thinking that there should be a new trial, because the Judge has not expounded the word comprehensively enough, for the purpose of enabling the jury to decide this particular issue on the evidence before them. I do not think he was bound to do more, but that he ought to have done.

ALDERSON, B. added, I think such a "place" as my Brother Rolfe alludes to would be in the town if it was occupied as a mere accessory to the convenience of the dwelling-houses, otherwise if it was an inlet to the country.

PARKE, B.—I think so too; and probably a garden attached to a house, and occupied along with it, should be reckoned as part of the house in considering whether the houses are continuous.

Vict. c. 110.*

The returns of the names of shareholders under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, are sufficient prima facie evidence that the parties named in them are shareholders, to justify the Court in issuing execution against them under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. s. 68.

Notice under that section need not be personally served.

The defendants in this case were a company completely registered under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110.

The plaintiff had obtained judgment against the company; and a rule had been obtained calling on a party to shew cause why execution should not issue against him as a shareholder, under the 68th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110.

Bramwell now shewed cause.—The act renders a suggestion or scire facias unnecessary, and if the Court allow execution to issue against the party their decision is final. He has no opportunity of traversing or disputing the facts. It is, therefore, incumbent on the plaintiff to shew everything requisite to complete his liability, and here he fails to shew that the party is a shareholder. The affidavits have annexed to them a certified copy of the return of the names of the shareholders. The name of the party in question appears on that return; it is sworn that the name is his, and it must be taken to be so. That is all that is shewn, and this is no evidence that he really was a shareholder. Unless it appears that he in some way sanctioned the return, it is no evidence against him. The Banking Act, 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. s. 6, contains a provision, that the returns under that act shall be evidence that the persons named therein as members of the banking company were members of it at the time of the return, but there is no such provision in the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. The certified copy is by the 18th section made evidence that the return was made, but no more.

It also appears that the notice given in this case was not personally served on the party.

[ALDERSON, B.—The return is made in pursuance of a public duty; and the question is, whether the fact that a party's name appears on that return as a shareholder, is not a sufficient prima facie case to induce the Court to act as if the party was a shareholder, when he has an opportunity of denying it, and does not do so. It is not as if the question was whether it was evidence for a jury. We often act on information and belief. As for the notice, the party must have ten days' notice so brought home to him as to enable him to appear, but the act is silent as to its being personal notice.]

June 13. } BUTLER v. CORNEY.

Costs—Suggestion on the Roll—County Court—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 129.—Affidavit, negating Exceptions.

The defendant does enough to obtain leave to enter a suggestion to deprive the plaintiff of costs, under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 129, if by his affidavits he brings the case within sections 128. and 129; he need not negative any grounds for refusing the suggestion not mentioned in these sections. Such grounds, if they exist, are to be shewn by the other party.

If a prima facie case be made out for entering a suggestion, the Court will not inquire into a doubtful point of law, which may be raised upon the record after the suggestion is entered.

The Court gave leave to enter a suggestion to deprive the plaintiff of costs in an action on a bill of exchange in which he had recovered less than 20l., without expressing any opinion as to whether bills of exchange were within the jurisdiction of the county courts.

In this case a rule had been obtained to enter a suggestion on the roll to deprive the plaintiff of costs under the County Courts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 129.

The affidavits on which the rule was obtained stated, that the action was on a contract and for a cause for which a plaint might have been levied in the county court; that the plaintiff recovered only 19l. 15s.; that the plaintiff and the defendant dwelt within twenty miles of each other at the time the action commenced, and that neither party was an officer of the court.

Needham now shewed cause, and contended, that the defendant ought to have shewn by his affidavit that the plaintiff was not an attorney, as an attorney might still sue in the superior court—Jones v. Brown (1); also that the contract on which the action was brought was not a contract of marriage, and that the cause of action was not one of those over which the county court, by section 58, has no jurisdiction.

[PARKE, B.—The sections on which the defendant grounds his application are the 128th and 129th. These deprive the plaintiff of costs under certain circumstances, and the defendant does enough if he brings the case within these; the onus of shewing that the case is within some provision not mentioned in these sections lies on the other side. If the plaintiff was an attorney, or the action was for breach of contract of marriage, the plaintiff may shew it by affidavit. The defendant was not bound to negative it.]

He then relied on his affidavits, which shewed that part of the cause of action was on a bill of exchange.

[PARKE, B.—It has been said that the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and my Brother Maule have expressed a doubt whether a bill of exchange is within the jurisdiction of the county court. I should like to hear the grounds for that doubt, as I do not know them. The question now before us is, whether a suggestion should be entered: that is not final, but it generally practically decides the question, and I should like to learn what are the grounds for the doubt said to have been thrown out in the Common Pleas. It is an important point if bills of exchange are really not within the statute.]

A bill does not give a cause of action arising within any jurisdiction. There are numerous cases relating to the change of venue deciding this—Mondel v. Steele (2), in which all the cases are reviewed.

[ALDERSON, B.—Is not the meaning of the 128th section, that the superior court shall not have concurrent jurisdiction when any material part of the cause of action arises within the jurisdiction of the county court?]

It is clear that the acceptance of the bill or its presentment, which are material parts of the cause of action, must have a locality, and may be within the jurisdiction of the county court.

Manisty, in support of the rule.—The affidavits shew that the action was not exclusively on the bill; it was partly for goods sold and delivered; and these were a material part of the cause of action.

[ALDERSON, B.—The section is awkwardly worded, and I am not certain that it does not mean "if no material part of the cause of action arises out of the jurisdiction," instead of meaning, as I at first thought, "if any material part arises within it."]

The meaning seems to be, that if any material part arose out of the jurisdiction the superior courts have concurrent jurisdiction.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The rule must be made absolute, on the simple ground that the matter ought to be put on the record. By permitting the suggestion to be entered on the record, we decide nothing finally; for the plaintiff may traverse it or demur: whereas, if we refuse to allow it, we decide conclusively against the defendant. It is sufficient to say there is not such an answer given as to induce us to do that. I express no opinion on the question, as to whether the superior courts have concurrent jurisdiction with the county court over bills of exchange for less than 20*l.*, except that it is, at least, so doubtful a point as to render it our duty not to deprive the defendant of the power to raise it on the record.

ALDERSON, B. concurred.

ROLFE, B.—When it is once decided that a suggestion is the proper course, I think it is very inconvenient to try the merits upon affidavit. I doubt if there is any other reason why a party must come to us for leave to enter a suggestion than that the party has not the custody of the record; and if he makes a prima facie case, it seems almost a matter of right that the suggestion should be entered.

Any written instrument, operating as the record of a transfer of property, is a conveyance within the meaning of the Stamp Act.

Such an instrument, if it be "a memorandum, letter, or agreement, relating to the sale of goods, wares and merchandise," is exempted from all stamp duty, but if it operate as a transfer of anything else, it must be stamped as a conveyance.

of severance of chattels attached to the soil, but not part of the freehold. A transfer of "fixtures" is, therefore, at least the transfer of the right of severance; and whether a memorandum of the sale of fixtures transfers any interest in the chattels themselves, or not, it is a conveyance within the words of the Stamp Act, which include the "transfer of any right;" and as fixtures are not goods, wares and merchandise, it is not within the exemption. Therefore, a memorandum using words in the past tense, "Memorandum that A. B. has sold the goods and fixtures in a shop to C. D., signed by both parties, was held to require an ad valorem stamp as a conveyance."

This was an action of trover.

Pleas—Not guilty; and not possessed.

At the trial, before Rolfe, B., at the Liverpool Spring Assizes, it became a part of the plaintiff's case to give in evidence a written instrument. The instrument was signed by both parties, and was expressed in the past tense as a memorandum that A. B. "*has sold to C. D. all the goods, stock in trade, and fixtures in a certain shop, for 50*l." It bore an agreement stamp, and the objection was taken that the instrument operated as a conveyance, and ought, therefore, to have borne an ad valorem stamp of 1*l.* 10*s.* The learned Judge gave the defendant leave to move to enter a nonsuit on this objection, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

Martin obtained a rule to shew cause accordingly.

Knowles and Atherton now shewed cause.—The sole question is as to the sufficiency of the stamp. In order to require a stamp as a conveyance an instrument must operate as one, and of itself vest the property in the transferee. This instrument purports to be, and is, a memorandum of a by-gone sale, which had vested the property in the transferee before the execution of the instrument. Such a memorandum of a by-gone transaction requires only an agreement stamp, and not a conveyance stamp. There is no exemption in the Stamp Act of conveyances relating to goods, wares, and merchandise; and if this instrument is a conveyance, every case in which a broker's bought and sold notes unstamped have been received in evidence is wrongly decided; but those cases are rightly decided, for memoranda of a by-gone bargain are not conveyances, but memoranda which are evidence of a contract or agreement; and which, if they relate to the sale of goods, wares and merchandise, are exempted from all duty; and if they relate to other things as well, they are subject only to an agreement stamp. Had it not been for the word "fixtures" used in the instrument, it would have required no stamp at all: as it is, it is rightly stamped, for this is no conveyance of the fixtures; they are things fixed to the freehold. No instrument, not under seal, can operate as more than an agreement to transfer them, for they are, like a house, part of the freehold.

[PARKE, B.—No. How, if that were the case, would the sheriff be justified in seizing them? That shews that they are unquestionably chattels, though they are not goods, wares and merchandise. What is meant by fixtures is the right to remove certain things fixed to the soil. The law in favour of the creditor says, that the sheriff may, under a f. fa., exercise this right of removal.]

If that be the nature of fixtures, this cannot be a conveyance, as far as they are concerned. It must operate as an agreement that the purchaser may enter and sever the things, and convert them into goods, wares, and merchandise, and that after they are converted the property shall pass. It therefore requires an agreement stamp only. The Court makes no intendment in favour of the Stamp Laws—Phillips v. Morrison (1).

Martin, in support of the rule.—The effect of the Stamp Laws upon evidence is productive of much injustice, and it is to be wished they were altered; but whilst the Stamp Act remains law, it would be absurd to enable parties to evade it, by wording instruments in the past tense, and then saying that they are not conveyances, but memoranda of by-gone transactions. "The general principle," says Parke, B., in Jones v. Ryder (2), "is, that every instrument ought to be stamped according to its legal operation."

[PARKE, B.—That is correct. You must make out that if there was an act of parliament passed, enacting that the things to which the instrument refers could not be transferred without writing, an instrument in these terms would satisfy the act of parliament and transfer them, or the instrument is not a conveyance.]

Sheppard's Touchstone, p. 232, says, "The best way in grants is to grant by words in the present tense as well as in the preterperfect tense; but a grant by words of the preterperfect tense only, as by dedi et concessi only, without words of the present tense, is good." So Lord Coke says, "And he to whom such a deed, comprehending dedi, &c. is made, may plead it as a grant"—Co. Litt. 301, b. It is impossible, therefore, to say, that the use of the past tense prevents an instrument from operating as a conveyance. What was there to transfer the property if not this instrument? The very nonsuit proceeds on the ground that the plaintiff cannot prove the transfer by anything but the writing. Then, fixtures are not within the exemption in the Stamp Act, and are transferred by this writing—Thompson v. Pettit (3).—(He was then stopped by the Court.)

PARKE, B.—The question is, whether this instrument operates as a transfer within the meaning of the Stamp Laws. The words in the schedule to the 55 Geo. 3. c. 189. are, "Conveyance, whether grant, disposition, lease, assignment, transfer, release, renunciation, or of any other kind or description whatsoever, upon the sale of any lands, tenements, rents, annuities, or other property real or personal, heritable or moveable, or of any right, title, interest, or claim into or out of, or upon any lands, tenements, rents, annuities, or other property, that is to say, for or in respect of the principal or only deed, instrument, or other writing, whereby the lands or other things sold shall be granted, leased, assigned, transferred, released, renounced, or otherwise conveyed to or vested in the purchaser." These are very large and comprehensive words, including not only transfers of all kinds of property, but also of any right or interest into or out of, or upon any property. Does, then, this instrument come within these words?—It is termed a memorandum, but that can make no difference if it operates as a conveyance. Then the objection is made that it cannot operate as a conveyance, because the words are in the past tense. That, however, is immaterial. If the parties have so expressed themselves as to make it apparent on the face of the instrument that the writing was intended to be the record of the transfer, it is immaterial whether the words used be in the past tense or in the present. The passage in Sheppard's Touchstone shows this; and that passage, which must be considered as the language of Mr. Justice Doddridge, is entitled to very great weight as an authority, as every opinion of that very learned lawyer is. It is a very ingenious argument that if this operated as a conveyance all brokers' bought and sold notes, which unquestionably are meant to be records of the sale, were conveyances, and as such required a stamp, for, as the plaintiff's counsel contended, the exemption in the Stamp Act did not extend to conveyances of goods, wares and merchandise, but only to agreements relating to the sale of them. That made me pause, for we should occasion much confusion if we were now to decide that a memorandum amounting to a bargain and sale of goods, wares, and merchandise required a conveyance stamp. The exemption, however, in the Stamp Act is not so confined. It exempts from all stamp duties any "memorandum, letter, or agreement for or relating to the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise." So that though this memorandum is a conveyance of the goods, wares and merchandise, it would fall within the exemption, and require no stamp, if it did not also embrace fixtures. Then the plaintiff's counsel argued, that so far as related to fixtures, the instrument could only operate as an agreement to permit the party to enter and sever the fixtures, and could not transfer the property before severance from the soil. The instrument, however, operates at least as a transfer of the right of severance. In Thompson v. Pettit, the Court of Queen's Bench held, that a transfer of fixtures eo nomine transferred the right of severance, and more, for they held that it transferred such an interest in the chattels as to support trespass. This instrument is, then, the record of the transfer of fixtures, and whether by that is understood a transfer of the chattels themselves, or only of the right of severance, it is a conveyance within the comprehensive words of the Stamp Act; and as fixtures, though chattels, are not goods, wares and merchandise, it is not within the exemption. If we held that the use of the past tense prevented an instrument from being liable to a stamp as a conveyance, though having the full effect of one, we should be opening a door for evading the Stamp Laws altogether. No one can doubt, that if there was an act of parliament that fixtures should not be transferred without writing, this instrument would satisfy it.

Deed, Construction of—Banking Company—Lien—Dividends.

By the deed of settlement of a joint-stock bank, it was provided, "that the directors should have a lien on the shares and stock of every shareholder for all debts due to the company, and that such lien should at all times be the paramount lien on the shares and stock of such shareholder; and the directors were empowered to cancel and declare forfeited the shares, or to sell and dispose of them, or otherwise deal with the same to obtain payment of the said debts":—Held, that the company had a lien against a shareholder who had overdrawn his account, not only on the shares, but also on the dividends arising from them.

This was an action of assumpsit against the defendant as the registered public officer of the Barnsley Banking Company for money had and received, and on an account stated.

Plea—Non assumpsit.

At the trial, before Alderson, B., at the York Spring Assizes, 1848, it appeared that the action was brought by a shareholder to recover two dividends on his shares, amounting to 12*l.* each. On a dividend being declared, the course of business was for the directors of the bank to issue a circular to the shareholders, stating to each shareholder the amount of the dividend payable to him, and giving notice of the day on which the amount would be payable at the bank on demand. The plaintiff was a shareholder in the bank; and two successive half-yearly dividends having been declared, on each occasion the directors sent him a letter stating that the amount of the dividends on his shares was 12*l.*, and that that amount would be paid to him on demand at the bank on a future day therein stated. The plaintiff demanded the amount of each dividend, respectively, at the bank after the day named for payment had elapsed, and was refused on the ground that he had overdrawn his account as a customer of the bank, and that the bank had a lien on the dividends for the balance of his private account. The deed of settlement of the company was in evidence as part of the plaintiff's case. It appeared that, in fact, his private account was overdrawn, and that the balance against him exceeded 24*l.* The learned Judge nonsuited the plaintiff, with leave to move to enter a verdict for 24*l.*

Baines having obtained a rule accordingly,—

Martin and Hugh Hill now shewed cause. —The nonsuit was right; for by the terms of the deed (1), the bank had a lien on the

(1) The clauses of the deed referred to in the course of the argument by the counsel on both sides were the 8th, 33rd and 49th, which were as follows:—

8th clause. "That each shareholder shall be entitled to and interested in the profits, and shall be subject and liable to the losses of the company, rateably and in proportion to his shares in the capital fund or joint stock thereof."

33rd clause. "That the directors for the time being shall have a lien on the shares and stock of every shareholder of the said company, for and in respect of all debts, liabilities, and engagements, due to and subsisting with the company, by or on the part of such shareholder, either in respect of cash advances, or any balance or balances, or running bills or notes, or on any account generally, and whether such debts, liabilities, or engagements be those of such shareholder individually, or jointly, or as surety for or in partnership with any other person or persons; and such lien shall at all times and in all cases, be the first and paramount lien on the shares and stock of every such shareholder; and such directors may and they are hereby empowered to cancel and extinguish and declare forfeited, or to sell and dispose of the shares of such shareholder, either wholly or in part, or otherwise deal with the same, as the case may seem to dividends; and even if it had not, money had and received will not lie for dividends. (The Court, without expressing any opinion on this latter objection, desired him to confine his argument at present to the question, whether by the deed the bank had a lien on the dividends.)

He then read the 33rd clause of the deed.

[PARKE, B. — There never was a time antecedent to the demand and refusal of the money at which the plaintiff was entitled to require, in order to obtain satisfaction or payment of all or any part of such debts, liabilities, or engagements."

49th clause. "That a general annual meeting of the shareholders of this company shall be held on the second Thursday in the month of February, in each and every year, during the continuance of this company, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, at such convenient place in Barnsley as the directors for the time being shall appoint, of which meeting the directors for the time being shall cause fourteen days' previous notice to be given, by means of a circular letter, signed by the manager, or such other person or persons as they may appoint for that purpose, or by means of an advertisement in one or more of the neighbouring newspapers; and such meeting shall be called 'The Annual General Meeting'; and the shareholders, qualified according to the provisions contained in these presents to act and vote at such meeting, who may personally attend the same, shall and they are hereby invested with full power and authority to decide upon all such motions, questions, propositions, matters, and things as, by virtue of these presents, or any supplementary deed or deeds of settlement, shall or may be brought before such annual general meeting; and at every annual general meeting of the shareholders, the directors for the time being shall exhibit a true and accurate balance sheet, deduced from the transactions of the preceding year, of the profits and accumulations and losses of the company, and shall make a report for the preceding year of the state and progress of the affairs of the company, to the 31st of December last preceding such meeting, and also the result of such other accounts and statements as the directors shall deem expedient for the interests of the company to be made public; and the dividends of the profits of the then preceding year (except of the first year, as hereafter stated) shall be then declared by the directors for the time being; or such dividends may be declared half-yearly, if the directors for the time being shall consider it more desirable; and when any dividend shall have been declared, the directors shall, seven days before the day appointed for the payment thereof, give notice, by circular letter addressed to each of the proprietors, of the amount and time and place of payment of such dividend; but no proprietor, nor his executors, administrators, or other representatives, being in arrear in respect to any instalment or call, shall be entitled to receive any part of such dividend, until such arrear and all interest thereon shall have been fully paid."

it. Here, by the terms of the circular on which the plaintiff relies to make out his case, the money is to be paid on a demand being made at the bank. It is not, therefore, like the case of an ordinary debt where the debtor owes the money at once, and is bound to seek out the creditor and pay him; but here the creditor is to go to the bank and make a demand, and the money is not payable till he does so. Then, at the time he makes the demand, the balance of his private account is against him and exceeds the dividend; if therefore the bank have a lien, the refusal to pay is justified. The question, therefore, is reduced to this, whether the lien given on the shares extends also to the proceeds of those shares.]

That is so: and it is clear that there is a lien on the dividends, for the principal includes the accessory. A pledge of the cow is a pledge of the milk.—(He was then stopped by the Court.)

Pashley, in support of the rule.—The question which is meant to be raised is, whether the lien does extend to the dividends. It is not correct law that a lien on the principal is a lien on the accessory. The question must turn entirely on the construction of the deed; and it is to be observed, that where the framers of the deed intend to give a lien on the dividends as well as the shares for the calls in the 49th clause, they use express words to give a lien on the dividends, and in the 8th clause they make a distinction between the shares and the profits. The words in the 33rd section must be taken to be used, therefore, in their plain meaning. This Court, in Fowler v. Churchill and Churchill v. the Bank of England (2), held, that a charge on stock under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. ss. 14, 15, did not prevent the debtor from recovering the dividends.

[PARKE, B.—There the decision was, that on the construction of the statute the charge was to be enforced in equity and not at law. The persons in whose names the stock stood were to receive the dividends from the bank, and be accountable for them afterwards. Lord Abinger there says: "When the Judge's orders are made absolute, the executors are chargeable with the proper distribution of the fund, but the bank is bound to pay it to them;" and my Brother Rolfe says, "The Bank of England has nothing to do with questions between the parties, but is bound to pay over the dividends to the legal owner."]

At all events, by sending notice to the plaintiff that he might have the dividend, the bank have waived their lien.

PARKE, B.—I am of opinion that the nonsuit was right. There is no doubt that the circular gave the plaintiff no right to receive the dividends before demanding them at the bank; and it is no waiver of the lien, for the bank at the time of sending forth that circular did not know whether they should have to exercise their lien or not—non constat but that the shareholder may pay off the debt before he comes for the dividend. The question, therefore, is, whether the true construction of the deed is, that the bank shall have a lien upon the dividends as well as the shares, or not. The common law gives in an ordinary partnership a lien for the debts of an individual partner, not only on the debtor's share of the partnership capital, but also on his share of the profits; and in putting a construction on this deed we must bear in mind what the ordinary rights of partners are. Is there, then, anything in the words of this instrument to shew that the parties intended that a construction should be given to it which would deprive the bank of a lien which an ordinary partnership would have by the common law? There is nothing. On the contrary, the words authorize the directors "to sell and dispose of the shares, either wholly or in part, or otherwise deal with the same as the case may seem to require, in order to obtain payment of the debts." I can have no doubt, that if the directors instead of selling the shares choose to keep them, and work off the debt by retaining the dividends, they may do so. I think, therefore, the nonsuit was right.

*A delivery ticket issued by a railway company, as common carriers, in respect of goods they had undertaken to carry, described several persons, amongst others J, as porters in their employ. Case. The declaration stated, that the defendants were common carriers of goods and chattels for hire, and that the plaintiff, on the 23rd of November 1846, at the Andover Road station of the London and South-Western Railway, caused to be delivered to the defendants, and the defendants then accepted and received a certain bale of silk of the value of 150*l.*, to be safely and securely carried and conveyed by the defendants to London, and there safely and securely to be delivered to the plaintiff for certain reasonable reward in that behalf, &c. The declaration then went on to allege, that the defendants, not regarding their duty in that behalf, did not nor would safely or securely deliver the same to the plaintiff; but, on the contrary, the defendants so carelessly and negligently behaved and conducted themselves in the premises, that by and through the carelessness, negligence, and default of the defendants, &c., the said bale of silk, &c. became and was lost to the plaintiff, &c.

Pleas—First, not guilty. Second, that the said bale of silk was not delivered to the defendants modo et formâ. Third, that the said bale of silk, in the declaration mentioned, and therein alleged to have been received by the defendants as such common carriers as aforesaid, contained only goods and chattels and property of a certain description, to wit, the silk in the said declaration mentioned, and exceeded in value the sum of 10*l.*; and that the said bale of silk was theretofore, to wit, on the day and year in the declaration mentioned, delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants, as common carriers by land of goods for hire, to be carried from and to the places in the declaration mentioned, at a certain office or receiving-house of the defendants for the receipt of goods to be carried by them as such common carriers as aforesaid, to wit, the said Andover Road station of the defendants; and that before and at the time when the said bale of silk was so delivered at the said office of the defendants as aforesaid, the defendants had caused to be affixed, and there was affixed, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, in legible characters in a public and conspicuous part of the said office, a notice whereby the defendants notified that a certain increased rate of charge therein mentioned was required to be paid over and above the ordinary rate of carriage as a compensation for the greater risk and care to be taken for the safe conveyance of, amongst other things, silk exceeding the value of 10*l.*; and that at the time of the delivery of the said bale of silk at the said office of the defendants as aforesaid, the value and nature thereof were not declared by the person sending or delivering the same; and that neither the increased charge nor any engagement to pay the same was accepted by the person receiving the said bale of silk at the said office. Verification.

Replication—Issue joined as to the first two pleas. As to the last, that whilst the said bale of silk was in the charge and possession of the defendants, as such common carriers as aforesaid, to wit, &c., the same was unlawfully and feloniously stolen, taken, and carried away by a certain then servant of the defendants, then in the employ of the defendants, to wit, one Thomas Johnson, whereby the same was not safely and securely carried, or conveyed, or delivered as aforesaid, and then was and now is wholly lost to the plaintiff, solely by reason of the said felonious act of the said Thomas Johnson, &c.

Rejoinder, that whilst the said bale of silk was in the charge and possession of the defendants, as such common carriers, &c., the same was not unlawfully and feloniously stolen, taken, and carried away by a then servant of the defendants, then in the employ of the defendants, modo et forma.

The cause was tried, before Pollock, C.B., at the London Sittings, when it appeared that the bale of silk, the subject-matter of the action, had been delivered on the 23rd of November 1846, at the booking-office of the South-Western Railway Company, at the Andover Road station, and was directed to the residence of the plaintiff, in Bunhill Row, London. The silk was of greater value than 10*l.*; and although there was a notice stuck up in the booking-office, to the effect, required by the statute 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 8. s. 2, that an increased rate of charge was payable in respect of, amongst other things, silk exceeding in value 10*l.*, no such increased charge had been paid, or the value of the silk declared, but the ordinary charge upon parcels had only been paid. It appeared further, that on the following day the silk was forwarded up by train to the London terminus, where it was put into one of the vans belonging to Chaplin & Horne, who were employed by the railway company to deliver parcels to their various addresses in London. The silk, however, never reached its destination, having been stolen by one Thomas Johnson, who had the charge of the van into which the bale had been put. The delivery ticket of the bale, and which was in the form of those usually given, was as follows:—

(114) London and South-Western Railway Company.—Southampton, Gosport, &c. every morning before eight, and afternoon before six o'clock. From Hamburgh Wharf, Lower Thames Street, &c. (Here followed a notice from the company that they would not be liable for certain descriptions of articles except on certain conditions; and concluding thus:—"The delivery of the goods will be considered complete when the same are unloaded out of the waggon, dray, or cart, and placed at the door of the consignee, the cellaring or warehousing them afterwards will be at the owner's risk.") Any servant of the company taking more than is stated in this ticket will be dismissed.

Notice.—The company are not responsible for any parcel above the value of 10*l.*, unless declared as such at the time of booking, and entered and paid for accordingly. It is requested that any irregularity may be notified immediately to Chaplin & Horne, agents.

It also appeared in evidence, that Johnson was the servant of Chaplin & Horne; that he had been hired by them, and paid by them, and was subject to be discharged by them. At the close of the case it was submitted to the Judge, that Johnson could not be considered as the servant of the defendants, within the meaning of the 8th section of the 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 68. The learned Judge was of a different opinion, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, leave, however, being reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict on the third issue, if the Court should think that Johnson was not the servant of the defendants within the meaning of that section. A rule to shew cause having been accordingly obtained,—

Sir F. Thesiger and Woolrych now shewed cause.—The 8th section of the 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 68. enacts, that “nothing in this act shall be deemed to protect any mail contractor, stage coach proprietor, or other common carrier for hire, from liability to answer for loss or injury to any goods or articles whatsoever, arising from the felonious acts of any coachman, guard, book-keeper, porter, or other servant, in his or their employ, nor to protect any such coachman, guard, book-keeper, or other servant from liability for any loss or injury occasioned by his or their own personal neglect or misconduct.” The question, as to whether a party is the servant of a carrier within the meaning of this section, is one of fact. In the present case, there was abundance of evidence to warrant the finding of the jury, that Johnson was the servant of the railway company, and although some of the evidence at the trial went to shew that he was also the servant of Chaplin & Horne, there is nothing inconsistent in his being the servant of both. The Court now called upon—

Martin and M. Smith to support the rule.

[PARKE, B.—You have two points to argue. It may be said, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the defendants, by their delivery ticket, in which Johnson was described as a porter in their employment, are estopped from denying that he was such servant, as against the plaintiff. If that document does not amount to an estoppel, then arises the point, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, Johnson was the servant of the company within the meaning of the 8th section (1).]

First, then, this document did not operate as an estoppel.

[POLLOCK, C.B. referred to Pickard v. Sears (2), Gregg v. Wells (3), and Coles v. the Bank of England (4).]

Those cases are not applicable to the present; they are authorities for the doctrine laid down by Lord Denman, in Pickard v. Sears, that “where one, by his words or conduct, wilfully causes another to believe the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act in that belief, so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time;” but in the present case, there is not the slightest evidence that the plaintiff was induced by the statements in this delivery ticket to enter into the contract. On the contrary, it had nothing to do with the terms of the contract. In the second place, then, was Johnson the servant of the defendants within the meaning of the 8th section of the statute? Was he “a porter or other servant in their employ”? It is submitted that he was not. The legislature only intended to make carriers answerable for the felonious acts of those who were their own servants, hired, paid, and liable to be discharged by them; and not for the acts of persons who were the servants of others, although employed in the delivery of the goods. In the case of Laugher v. Pointer (5), Littledale, J., in deciding that the defendant was not liable for the negligent driving of a coachman provided by the person of whom the defendant hired horses, said, that it "was not the case of a man employing his own immediate servants, either domestic servants or others engaged by him to conduct any business or employment or occupation, carried on by him. For the jobman was a person carrying on a distinct employment of his own, in which he furnished men and let out horses to hire to all such persons as chose to employ him. This coachman was not hired by the defendant; he had no power to dismiss him. He paid him no wages. The man was only to drive the horses of the jobman." And further on, in his judgment, his Lordship adds, "The cases referred to only shew, indeed, the owner of the horses to be liable, but it may be said the traveller is liable also. I think not. The coachman or postillion cannot be the servant of both. He is the servant of one or the other, but not the servant of one and the other. The law does not recognize a several liability in two principals who are unconnected." The doctrine laid down by Littledale, J., in Laugher v. Pointer, was confirmed by this Court in the subsequent cases of Quarman v. Burnett (6) and Rapson v. Cubitt (7), and by the Court of Queen's Bench in Milligan v. Wedge (8). Applying that doctrine to the present case, it appears to be clear that Johnson was the servant of Chaplin & Horne, and not of the defendants. He was hired by Chaplin & Horne, and was liable to be dismissed by them, and not by the defendants. And in Coates v. Chaplin (9), it was accordingly held, under similar circumstances to the present, that Chaplin & Horne were liable.

[ROLFE, B.—It did not appear in that case what were the particular terms of the contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants. The only point taken was, whether the plaintiff was the proper person to maintain the action.]

It was not denied, however, that Chaplin & Horne were in that case liable to some one.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. There was a serious question of law to be argued, which could not be disposed of by simply producing the document and saying that the defendants were estopped from denying that Johnson was their servant, but which has now been argued by the defendant's counsel not at greater length or with less industry and learning than the occasion demanded. That argument amounts in substance to this: that Chaplin & Horne had the conduct of that part of the business of the defendants which consisted in the delivery of goods sent up by the railway, from the terminus to different parts of London, and that not as servants of the company but as agents; that Johnson was the servant of Chaplin & Horne and not of the company; and that the effect of the act of parliament was to give an indemnity to the company as carriers from liability in respect of loss in case certain conditions had not been complied with; which liability was re-imposed by the 8th section in those cases only where the loss has been occasioned by the felonious act of an actual servant of the company. But giving full weight to that argument, believing also that it is our duty not to make acts of parliament, but simply to construe them, bearing in mind also the strong observations of Mr. Justice Littledale in giving judgment in Laugher v. Pointer, I am still of opinion that this rule should be discharged upon the ground that this was an employment of Johnson by the company as appears from the heading of the delivery ticket, without reference to that portion of it in which Johnson's name appears. For, what is written in the first part of that document proves that the company undertook to receive the bale of silk in question in the country, and to deliver it from thence to the plaintiff's residence in Bunhill Row; and it appears to me that for the purpose of that delivery Johnson was a porter in the employ of the company within the meaning of the 8th section of the statute. The object of that statute was, undoubtedly, to give protection to carriers in cases of small parcels of great value being delivered to them to carry; and the legislature has said that they shall not then be liable for loss unless an extra price by way of insurance is paid; but then by way of protection to the public the legislature has also said, that whether insured or not, the carrier shall still be liable if the loss has occurred through the "felonious act of a coachman, guard, book-keeper, porter, or other servant in his employ." Now, it appears to me, that that liability cannot be got rid of because those whom the carrier employs in carrying out his contract may bear the name of "agents," or "sub-contractors," or any other fanciful title, but that every person who is actually employed in the performance of the contract which the carrier has undertaken to perform are his servants within this section. In the present case, and for the purposes of this action, therefore, Chaplin & Horne must be considered as the servants of the company, and anybody whom Chaplin & Horne employed for the purpose of delivering these goods from the railway terminus to Bunhill Row were also the servants of the company; and it makes no difference that by reason of some contract between the company and Chaplin & Horne, the former have not the power of dismissing such servants. Upon the general question, therefore, turning on the mere construction of the act of parliament, when I find that the railway company undertook to receive these goods in the county of Hants and to deliver them in London, I think that everything done in that journey and in pursuance of that undertaking must be treated in law as done by the company and by their servants; and this rule therefore should be discharged. I may also add, that if I did entertain any doubt upon the general question, which I do not, I should be disposed to hold that when by this document Johnson is described as the servant of the company, and that by it the plaintiff is made debtor to them in respect of the whole matter, they cannot be allowed to substitute a different state of things from that which they so represent.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion as to the result of the present rule. Upon the question as to whether the company by issuing a delivery ticket, describing Johnson as one of their porters, were either estopped from shewing that that was not the case, or that the evidence of the document was conclusive upon that point, it appears to me that the document was merely matter of evidence, and taking all the evidence given at the trial into consideration, it shews that with respect to the mere fact of service, Johnson was rather the servant of Chaplin & Horne than of the company. But in my view of the case that is altogether immaterial. The opinion which I have formed upon the main question is one not given upon the spur of the moment, but arrived at after much consideration since the last argument. It appears from the evidence in the case that the company undertook as common carriers to deliver parcels from the various stations on their line to different parts of London, and that it was the practice of the company to carry those parcels in their carriages to Vauxhall, and to employ Chaplin & Horne as their agents in the delivery of the parcels thence to the various parts of London; that Chaplin & Horne employed Johnson to deliver this particular parcel to its destination, and that Johnson instead of delivering it stole it. Is the company liable for the loss the plaintiff thereby incurred? Now, it is clear that independently of the statute the defendants would be liable for the loss as a breach of the duty they had undertaken to perform. The statute, however, limits their responsibility by saying that in certain cases, of which this would have been one, they shall not be liable for loss unless an increased price for the carriage shall have been paid. But then comes the 8th section, which provides "that nothing in the act shall be deemed to protect any mail contractor, stage-coach proprietor, or other common carrier for hire from liability to answer for loss or injury to any goods or articles whatsoever, arising from the felonious acts of any coachman, guard, book-keeper, porter, or other servant in their employ." Was Johnson then a porter or a servant in the employ of the company? I think that he was. I entirely adhere to the principles laid down by Mr. Justice Littledale in Laugher v. Pointer, and which were afterwards acted upon by this Court in Quar-

1848. } COOKE AND FARQUHAR v.
June 29. } SEELEY AND ANOTHER.

Contract, Privity of—Principal and Agent—Partners—Banker—Parties.

There is in general sufficient privity of contract to maintain an action if the party actually making the contract with the defendant was acting for the plaintiff, and intended at the time to make the contract for him, though the defendant was not aware that the contract was made for the plaintiff.

The name in which the contract is made is primâ facie evidence of the party for whom the contract was made; but it is not conclusive (except by the custom of trade in the case of bills of exchange). Therefore where two plaintiffs sue on a contract between them and the defendants as bankers, and it appears at the trial that the bank account was opened in the name of one only of the plaintiffs, it is competent for the plaintiffs to prove that the account was opened on behalf of them both; and it is sufficient to maintain the action if it is proved that the plaintiff who actually opened the account at the time intended it to be the account of the two, without shewing that the defendants had before the action any notice that he had so intended. It lies on the plaintiff to prove this intention affirmatively; and the fact that the plaintiffs were partners, and that the money paid into the account belonged to the partnership, is not alone sufficient evidence to go to the jury that the contract was intended to be made on behalf of the two.

This was an action of assumpsit, containing counts on a special contract by the defendants to do their duty as bankers, and also counts for money lent and on an account stated.

Plea (amongst others)—Non assumpsit.

The action came on to be tried, before Platt, B., at the Spring Assizes, 1848, at Taunton, when the plaintiffs were nonsuited, on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury of the plaintiff Cooke being a party to the contract. The evidence on this point was, that the plaintiff Farquhar carried on business under the name of the Bridgewater Coal Company. The plaintiff Cooke was proved to be a partner in this concern, but that fact was not known to the public or to the defendants. The defendants were bankers at Bridgewater, and for some years they had an account with Farquhar. The pass-book, which, as usual, was alternately in the custody of the customer and the bankers, was headed, "John Farquhar, Esq. B.C.C." It was proved that monies belonging to the Bridgewater Coal Company were paid into this account from time to time; and a letter was put in evidence from Farquhar to the defendants in an early part of their connexion, in which he spoke of withdrawing "the company's account." There was no evidence that the defendants ever knew of Cooke before the commencement of the action.

For the defendants it was objected that on this evidence the contract on which the action was brought was exclusively with Farquhar; and Sims v. Brittain (1) and Sims v. Bond (2) were cited. The learned Judge being of opinion that there was no evidence of a joint contract, nonsuited the plaintiffs.

Crowder obtained a rule calling on the defendants to shew cause why there should not be a new trial, against which

Kinglake, Serj., Barstow, and Phinn, on the 29th of June, shewed cause.

[PARKE, B.—The question in this case is one of fact, as to the intention of Farquhar at the time he made the contract with the defendants. If, when he lent the money (for each deposit with a banker is a loan), he meant to lend the money for himself, and not for himself and partner, the two cannot sue; and it does not matter that the money belonged to the two, for Farquhar might intend that the bankers should be responsible to him alone, and he himself to his partner. But if he meant, at the time he made the loan, to make it for himself and partner, the two may sue; and in that case it is no matter whether it was partnership money or not: so that the ownership of the money is not material, except as a circumstance affording an inference as to Farquhar's intention. It is no matter other, by appointing sub-contractors to get rid of all responsibility from loss by theft, it would lead to very dangerous consequences indeed. With respect to the other point in the case, I agree with my Brother Rolfe in thinking that the delivery ticket did not amount to an estoppel as to the fact of Johnson being the servant of the company, but was merely evidence of that fact.

Set-off—2 Geo. 2. c. 22. s. 13.—Debt due after Action.

The defendant pleaded to the further maintenance of the action a set-off of a debt due from the plaintiff to the defendant, after the commencement of the suit and before plea:—Held, that the plea was ill.

Debt on an indenture whereby the defendant covenanted to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 500*l.* on the 22nd day of January 1830.

Plea to the debt and damages other than the costs—that the plaintiff ought not further to maintain his action, because the defendant says, that after the commencement of this suit, and before the time of the pleading of this plea, he, the plaintiff, became and was and still is indebted to the defendant in 550*l.*, for money since the commencement of this suit and before the pleading of this plea paid by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff, at his, the plaintiff's request, which said money exceeds the said debt and all damages other than the said costs, which money, he, the defendant, offers to set off, &c.

Demurrer, assigning for causes, that the plea does not shew that the debt attempted to be set off was due to the defendant at the commencement of this suit, and that it appears by the said plea, that the debt became due after the commencement of this suit, and that by law a debt becoming due after the commencement of an action cannot be set off in such action.

Butt, in support of the demurrer.—The plea is bad. A debt which did not exist at the commencement of the action cannot be made the subject of set-off. The 13th section of the 2 Geo. 2. c. 22. (1) relating to set-off, implies that the debt to be set off must be in existence at the time of the action brought. It can hardly be contended on the other side, that where the general issue is pleaded and a notice of set-off given, a defendant is confined to such grounds of set-off as existed at the commencement of the suit, but that under a plea of set-off he is enabled to give in evidence debts that accrued after action brought but before plea pleaded. Evans v. Prosser (2) and Braithwaite v. Coleman (3) shew that a plea of set-off that the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant "at the time of plea pleaded" is bad; and that it ought to state that the plaintiff was indebted "at the commencement of the action."

[POLLOCK, C.B.—There is certainly no precedent for a plea like the present.]

He cited Le Bret v. Papillon (4) and Rogerson v. Ladbroke (5).

Phipson, in support of the plea.—It must be conceded, on the part of the defendant, that no precedent can be found for a plea like the present; but the Court will determine the question by reference to the words of the statute. The act of parliament is remedial, very beneficial in its operation, and ought to receive a liberal construction. It enacts, that "where there are mutual debts between the plaintiff and the defendant," they may be the subject of set-off; and there are no words to shew that those debts must exist at the time of action brought. The statute then proceeds in these terms:—"One debt may be set off against the other, and such matter may be given in evidence upon the general issue or pleaded in bar as the nature of the case shall require." Those words do not mean that a set-off may be pleaded in bar of the whole action—Le Bret v. Papillon, but in such a manner as shall effectuate the object of the statute, and according to the forms in which the Courts allow anything to be pleaded in bar. The meaning of the statute would therefore be, that in some cases set-off might be pleaded to the further maintenance of the action. Here the nature of the case requires a plea like the present.

(1) That section enacts, "That where there are mutual debts between the plaintiff and the defendant, or if either party sue or be sued as executor or administrator where there are mutual debts between the testator or intestate and either party, one debt may be set against the other, and such matter may be given in evidence upon the general issue, or pleaded in bar, as the nature of the case shall require, so as at the time of his pleading the general issue where any such debt of the plaintiff, his testator or intestate is intended to be insisted on in evidence, notice shall be given of the particular sum or debt so intended to be insisted on, and upon what account it became due, or otherwise such matter shall not be allowed in evidence upon such general issue."

[ALDERSON, B.—A defendant cannot give notice of setting off any debts, except those existing at the commencement of the suit.]

The plea might be pleaded at Nisi Prius, puis darrein continuance.

[ALDERSON, B.—The ordinary mode of pleading a set-off has existed for 120 years.]

[POLLOCK, C.B.—And cases like the present must have occurred again and again, and yet we find no form of plea like the present.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—The plaintiff is entitled to judgment. There is no precedent to warrant such a plea as the defendant has attempted to introduce. The defendant cannot, in this mode, set off a debt that has arisen since the commencement of the action.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. The present case must have arisen again and again, and would have found its way into the books, but that every one must have thought there was no doubt upon the subject.

June 5. } BROWN AND WIFE v. HARTILL.

Covenant, Construction of—Notice.

A declaration in covenant, after reciting an agreement, dated the 27th of April 1840, between the plaintiffs and the defendant, and that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiffs in 60l., to be repaid with interest, stated the agreement thus:—That the sum of 60l. shall remain in the hands of J. H. (the defendant) from the date hereof for one whole year; that at the expiration of that period (if the interest shall be then paid, and no notice be then given to call in the same,) the 60l. shall continue in the hands of the said J. H. for another year, and so on from year to year, until notice in writing shall be given by the said W. B. (the plaintiff) to call in the same; that twelve calendar months' notice in writing shall be given to call in the said 60l., and that at the expiration of the said notice, the same shall be paid by instalments of 10l. every third month, until the whole amount be paid, the first payment of 10l. to be made at the expiration of fifteen months from the date of the said notice, so that the whole amount of 60l. shall be paid by the end of two years and six months from the date of the said notice. The declaration then stated, that on the 29th of May 1846, a notice in writing of that date was served upon the defendant, to call in the sum of 60l., and alleged, that although twelve calendar months from the date of service of the notice had elapsed before the commencement of this suit, and although six months from the expiration of the said twelve calendar months had also elapsed before the commencement of this suit, and although two instalments had become due and payable from the defendant, yet the defendant had not paid the said two instalments:—Held, (Platt, B. dissentiente,) that the notice to pay the principal sum might be given at any period of the year, and that the payment of the instalments was to be calculated from the date of the notice, and not from the end of the current year under the agreement.

Covenant. The declaration stated the making of an agreement, under seal, dated the 27th day of April 1840, between the defendant of the one part, and the plaintiffs of the other; and after reciting, amongst other things, that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in 60l., which he agreed to repay, with interest, at 5l. per cent., the deed proceeded thus: "that the said sum of 60l. shall remain in the hands of the said John Hartill, at and after the rate of interest aforesaid, from the day of the date hereof until the full end and term of one whole year. That at the expiration of that period (if the interest hereinbefore mentioned shall be then paid, and no notice be then given to call in the same) the said sum of 60*l.* shall continue in the hands of the said John Hartill for another year, and so on from year to year until notice in writing shall be given by the said W. Brown or Leah his wife to call in the same. That twelve calendar months' notice in writing shall be given to call in the said principal sum of 60*l.*, and that at the expiration of the said notice the same shall be paid by instalments of 10*l.* every third month, until the whole amount be paid; the first payment of 10*l.* to be made at the expiration of fifteen months from the date of the said notice, so that the whole amount or sum of 60*l.* shall be paid by the end of two years and six months from the date of the said notice, the interest to be paid upon such amount only as shall remain unpaid." The declaration then stated that on the 29th of May 1846, notice in writing of that date was served by the plaintiffs upon the defendant to call in the principal sum of 60*l.*, and that, at the expiration of twelve months from that date, the principal sum of 60*l.* would be required to be paid by instalments of 10*l.* every third month until the whole amount thereof should be paid, and that the first payment of 10*l.* was to be made at the expiration of fifteen months from the date of the notice last aforesaid, so that the whole of the said amount or sum of 60*l.* should be paid at the end of two years and six months from the date of the said last-mentioned notice, nevertheless although twelve calendar months from the date of the said last-mentioned notice and from the service thereof on the defendant had elapsed before the commencement of this suit, and although six months from the expiration of the said twelve calendar months had also elapsed before the commencement of this suit, and although two instalments of 10*l.* and 10*l.* of the said principal sum of 60*l.* had become due and payable from the defendant before the commencement of this suit, under and by virtue of the said memorandum of agreement, and of the said notice so given thereunder as aforesaid, yet the defendant hath never at any time paid to the plaintiffs, or either of them, the said two instalments of 10*l.*, and 10*l.*, or either of them, but the same still remain and are wholly due from and unpaid by the defendant. The declaration then alleged the non-payment of the interest due upon the said sum of 60*l.*

Demurrer. The causes assigned were that it did not appear that any sufficient notice to repay the principal money had been given, as it did not appear that such notice had been given at the expiration of any second or subsequent year, calculated from the date of the contract. That as the declaration shewed that the notice to call in the principal money was given after the expiration of the first year, the plaintiff should have made it appear clearly, by his declaration, that a period of fifteen months from the time of the giving of such notice had elapsed after the expiration of some second or subsequent year, calculated from the date of the alleged contract. Joinder in demurrer.

Crowder, in support of the demurrer.—The defendant contends that the notice, in order to be a valid one, must expire at the end of some year terminating at the date of the contract. The plaintiffs on the other hand contend that, after the end of the first year, a year's notice may be given to expire at any time. By the terms of this deed a quasi tenancy from year to year of this money is created.

[ALDERSON, B.—How do you explain the proviso at the end of the deed, that "the sum of 60*l.* shall be paid by the end of two years and six months from the date of the said notice"? Suppose a notice is given a week after the expiration of the year, under the agreement; according to your argument it would not expire until the end of two years all but a week, and then there would be the eighteen months for the payment of the instalments.]

That circumstance is in favour of the defendant, as it shews that the requisitions of the deed could be complied with only by a notice given at the exact end of each year.

[ALDERSON, B.—Your argument gives no effect to the words at the end of the deed "from the date of the said notice."] ]

Although the parties speak of the date of the notice, they mean the 27th of April, the time when the current year expires under the agreement. If this be not so, no effect is given to the expression that the money is to be held from year to year. The words in the covenant are "from year to year until notice in writing shall be given," not "shall have been given."

T. Jones, contra.—The pleader, in framing this declaration, has put a correct construction upon the instrument. Every difficulty would be removed if the word "unless" were substituted in the covenant for the word "until."

Crowder replied.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think the plaintiffs are entitled to the judgment of the Court. The question is, whether the notice to pay the principal sum is to expire at any period of the year, or at some year ending with the date of the agreement. The language of the deed is, that the money shall remain in the hands of the defendant for one whole year. It then proceeds, "that at the expiration of that period if the interest hereinbefore mentioned shall be then paid, and no notice be then given to call in the same." Those terms are ambiguous—they may mean if no notice shall then have been given, or they may have reference to the then present state of things. The deed then states that the money shall remain in the hands of Hartill "for another year, and so on from year to year, until notice in writing shall be given by the said William Brown, or Leah his wife, to call in the same, and that twelve calendar months' notice in writing shall be given to call in the said principal sum of 60*l.*, and that, at the expiration of the said notice, the same shall be paid by instalments of 10*l.* every third month until the whole amount be paid, the first payment of 10*l.* to be made at the expiration of fifteen months from the date of the said notice, so that the whole amount or sum of 60*l.* shall be paid by the end of two years and six months from the date of the said notice;" according to these terms the notice may be given on any day throughout the year, and when that is done the whole amount will be paid within the two years and six months. That explains the ambiguity, and shews that the words "until notice in writing shall be given" mean until notice in writing shall have been given.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. We must give a reasonable construction to this contract, with a view to effectuate its object if possible. The agreement is, that the defendant is to have the money for a year; and if, at the end of that time, interest is paid and no notice is given to call in the amount, the money is to continue in the defendant's hands for another year, and so on from year to year, unless notice in writing to pay the principal shall have been given. If at the expiration of the first year no notice has been given, and the interest has been paid, the defendant may hold it for another year. Now if the case stood there, the party entitled to the money might be put to some inconvenience, as the notice is to be of a particular length, namely, twelve months, and at the end of that time the payments are to be only by instalments. But then there is a stipulation that the entire sum shall be paid by the end of two years and six months from the date of the notice; so that, if the notice is dated on a particular day, and the instalments begin to be paid fifteen months after that date, the principal sum will be paid off within two years and a half from the date of the notice; whereas, if the defendant's counsel is correct in his argument, it is possible that three years and a half may elapse before the entire sum is paid off. Notice to pay the principal may be given at the end of the first year, subsequently to which time, if notice is not given within the year, the defendant is to hold the money from year to year. That view of the case gives effect to the whole instrument.

ROLFE, B.—The point has been argued as if there existed an analogy between this case and a tenancy from year to year, but the analogy is by no means complete, and does not assist the defendant in his argument. It appears to me, that a valid notice may be given at any time, and I should feel no doubt whatever on the point, but for the view entertained by my Brother Platt. It is argued on the part of the defendant, that the meaning of the covenant is, that if interest is paid, and no notice to pay the principal is given on the last day of the year under the agreement, the money is to go on from year to year. That, however, appears to me to be a forced construction, and to involve an absurdity. If interest is paid and no notice is given, the whole is consistent; the defendant then retains the money for another year; but if notice is given, that notice will regulate the terms on which the money is to be held. It seems to me, that according to the true construction of this instrument the plaintiffs may give notice at any time.

PLATT, B.—I regret that I am compelled to differ from the rest of the Court, but it appears to me that the defendant is entitled to judgment. Let us look at the instrument itself, and endeavour to ascertain when notice to pay the principal sum is to be given. The words of the deed are, that the sum of 60*l.* shall remain in the hands of Hartill for the term of one whole year. —[His Lordship then read other portions of the agreement.]—It appears to me from this instrument, that the parties intended that three years and a half should expire before payment of this money. Two years were to expire before the instalments at three months were to begin to run. On the whole, it appears to me that notice was intended to be given on some 27th day of April, the date of the deed. I must add, that I express my opinion with some distrust, seeing that it is at variance with that of my learned Brothers.

The declaration stated, that it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendant, that the plaintiffs should sell to the defendant 1,000 barrels of flour, to arrive at Liverpool by the Hottinguer, from New York; that should the vessel be lost before arriving at Liverpool the sale should be void. Averment, that the vessel was not lost, but did arrive at Liverpool from New York, having on board 1,000 barrels of flour. Breach, that the defendant did not accept the said flour. Plea, that the Hottinguer was one of a line of packet ships sailing from New York to Liverpool at fixed periods, published and known beforehand amongst merchants at Liverpool; that the Hottinguer was to have set sail from New York for Liverpool three weeks before the said agreement, and was, at the time of the agreement, expected to arrive at Liverpool within a week after; that it had been published and believed, amongst merchants at Liverpool, that the vessel was to arrive there in the course of the said voyage, which voyage was the voyage in this plea mentioned; that the plaintiffs had notice of the premises, and made the agreement with reference to the said voyage, and under the belief that the Hottinguer had sailed from New York; that the said vessel had not, at the time of the agreement, nor did she at any time set sail upon the said voyage in this plea mentioned, but that another vessel had been substituted for her, by reason whereof the defendant refused to accept and pay for the said flour: —Held, that the plea stated a different contract from that alleged in the declaration, and was therefore bad, as amounting to non assumpsit.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated, that it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendant, that the plaintiffs should sell to the defendant 1,000 barrels of flour, to arrive at Liverpool by a vessel, called the Hottinguer, from New York, at a certain price; that should the vessel be lost before arriving at Liverpool, the sale should be void; that although the vessel was not lost before arriving at Liverpool, and afterwards did arrive at Liverpool from New York, having on board 1,000 barrels of flour, yet the defendant did not nor would accept the said flour.

Fifth plea—That the said vessel, called the Hottinguer, at the time of the making of the said agreement, was one of a line of packet ships sailing from New York to Liverpool, and from Liverpool to New York, at certain fixed periods, published and known beforehand amongst merchants and traders at Liverpool, and that the Hottinguer was, according to the ordinary course and times of sailing of the said line of packet ships, to have set sail from New York for Liverpool, a certain time, to wit, three weeks before the time of the making of the said agreement, and was at the time of the making of the said agreement expected to arrive at Liverpool within one week after the time of the making of the said agreement, and that at the time of the making of the said agreement it had been published and was believed amongst merchants and traders at Liverpool that the said vessel was to arrive at Liverpool in the course of the said last-mentioned voyage, and that the said vessel was then performing such voyage, and that the voyage in the course of which the said vessel was to arrive as in the said agreement mentioned, was the voyage of the said vessel in this plea mentioned, and not any other or different voyage; that at the time of the making of the said agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant, the plaintiffs and the defendant had notice of all the premises in this plea aforesaid, and made the said agreement with reference to the said voyage in this plea mentioned, and under the belief that the Hottinguer had then sailed from New York to Liverpool on the said voyage; that the Hottinguer had not, at the time when the said agreement was so made, set sail, nor did she at any time set sail upon the said voyage, but on the contrary thereof the proprietors of the said line of packet ships had, without the knowledge of the plaintiffs or the defendant, before the time of the making of the said agreement, to wit, on &c., being the day when the Hottinguer was so to have set sail from New York, substituted another vessel for the Hottinguer, for the performance of the said voyage, which was so as aforesaid expected to be performed by the Hottinguer, and then caused the said other vessel to set sail from New York for Liverpool instead of the Hottinguer, and which same vessel afterwards, and within a short time after the making of the said agreement, to wit, on &c., duly arrived at Liverpool; that at the time of the making of the said agreement, the Hottinguer was at New York, without having any of the said barrels of flour on board, and did not take the said barrels of flour, or any of them, on board, until a long time after the making of the said agreement, to wit, until &c., when the Hottinguer took the said barrels of flour on board, and set sail from New York to Liverpool, on another and different voyage from the voyage in the course of which the said vessel was expected to arrive, as in the said agreement mentioned, and afterwards, to wit, on &c., arrived at Liverpool with the said barrels on board, in the course of the said last-mentioned voyage, and by reason of the premises the defendant became entitled to refuse to accept and pay for, and did refuse to accept and pay for the said barrels of flour. Verification.

Demurrer, assigning for causes, amongst others, that it was not stated in the plea how the agreement was made with reference to the voyage in the plea mentioned, and that the plea amounted to a denial of the agreement and promise alleged in the declaration, and amounted to the general issue. Joinder.

Cowling, in support of the demurrer.—The plea is bad, as amounting to the general issue, for it states an agreement which if proved would establish a different agreement from that which is stated in the declaration. The essence of the plea is, that the parties made an agreement with reference to a contract that the vessel had already sailed on a particular voyage. Secondly, the plea is bad in not shewing that the agreement was made with reference to that particular state of things. Thirdly, it is not a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to enforce this contract, that a particular voyage should have been in the contemplation of the parties, and that the vessel should have sailed on that voyage. There are, indeed, cases in which contracts of that description have been made, and Alewyn v. Pryor (1) is an example of such a contract; but the present case differs materially from that. Lowell v. Hamilton (2) affords another instance of such a contract. Johnson v. Macdonald (3) is also in point.

[ALDERSON, B.—If the plea means that the flour was to arrive by a vessel then on her voyage, it is not the contract set out in the declaration.]

Crompton, contra.—The declaration shews that the vessel is to arrive on a voyage from New York to Liverpool, and before the plaintiffs can recover they must shew that she arrived on the voyage on which she sailed.

[ALDERSON, B.—The question is, whether any existing voyage is meant.]

The plea shews that the voyage on which the vessel did arrive is not the same voyage the parties meant. The plea may indeed be bad on special demurrer, as amounting to an informal traverse of the arrival, but that defect is not specially pointed out. The plea shews what voyage the parties to the contract intended. The plaintiffs must be confined to some voyage; they cannot be allowed to substitute a voyage two or three years afterwards. Johnson v. Macdonald is in point.

[PLATT, B.—The contract in the declaration is general, and is not confined to the particular voyage.]

[ALDERSON, B.—The plea refers to a voyage in which the vessel was then engaged, and then it is a different contract from that stated in the declaration.]

Guarantie, Construction of—Evidence—Admissions.

The defendant signed an instrument, addressed to the plaintiff in the following terms:—"In consideration of your having, by indenture, agreed to accept payment of the debt owing to you by A. B, by the following instalments, that is to say, 10s. in the pound, on the 18th day of August next, &c., I promise to guarantee the payment of the instalments;" and delivered it to the plaintiff in exchange for an indenture executed by the plaintiff:—Held, that the true construction of the instrument was, that the defendant made his promise in consideration that the plaintiff would execute an indenture, and release A. B; and, consequently, that the execution of the instrument was not an admission by the defendant that the plaintiff had released A. B, and furnished no evidence in support of an issue taken on an allegation in the declaration that the plaintiff had released A. B.

(4) Pollock, C.B., Alderson, B., Rolfe, B., and Platt, B.

This was an action of assumpsit on a guarantie. The declaration stated that one Joseph Wilkinson was indebted to the plaintiff; and, thereupon, in consideration that the plaintiff would agree to accept payment by instalments of the said debt from the defendant, and would execute an indenture, purporting to be made by and between &c. (describing it), and thereby release unto the said J. Wilkinson the said debt, the defendant promised to pay the debt by instalments. The declaration then averred that the plaintiff did agree to accept payment, by instalments, of the debt, and did execute the said indenture, and did thereby release the said J. Wilkinson. Breach, non-payment of the instalments.

The defendant pleaded, first, non assumpsit; and, secondly, a traverse of the averment that the plaintiff executed the said indenture, and thereby released J. Wilkinson. (There were other pleas, which it is not necessary to notice.)

At the trial, before Rolfe, B., at the Liverpool Spring Assizes, 1848, this cause, and another of Hassall v. Cole, came on together. Hassall v. Cole, which was in the Queen's Bench, and in which the pleadings were the same as in the present case, was taken first. The plaintiff having, in support of the second issue, produced an indenture, called the attesting witness, who, on cross-examination, proved that he had counted the words in the indenture, and that they were somewhat above the number of words covered by the stamp on it. The indenture was, consequently, rejected. The plaintiff then produced and proved the guarantie in question, which was in the case of Hassall v. Cole, in the following terms:—"Mr. John Hassall. In consideration of your having, by indenture bearing date the 18th day of February 1847, agreed to accept payment of the debt owing to you by J. Wilkinson of Birkenhead, amounting to the sum of 650*l.*, by the following instalments, that is to say, the sum of 325*l.*, part thereof, being at the rate of 10s. in the pound, on the 18th day of August 1847, and the sum of 325*l.*, the residue of the said debt, on the 18th of February 1848, and of your having, by the same indenture, released the said J. Wilkinson from such debt, I do hereby guarantee to you the payment of such debt or sum of 650*l.*, at the times and in manner aforesaid. Dated this 18th of February 1847.

"William Cole."

It was proved that Cole signed agreements in this form, addressed to each of Wilkinson's creditors, and delivered them to his attorney, who carried them, with the indenture, to the creditors; each of whom, as he executed the deed, received his signed guarantie from the attorney at one and the same time.

For the plaintiff it was contended that the guarantie was an admission by the defendant that the plaintiff had released Wilkinson, and was original evidence of such release, though the indenture was not read. For the defendant it was objected that the guarantie was no admission of a past release, but rather a statement that one was intended to be made, and also that if it was an admission of a past release, the consideration being in that case bygone, would not, under non assumpsit, prove the promise laid in the declaration. It was also objected that there was a variance, inasmuch as the guarantie did not admit such an indenture as was described in the declaration.

The learned Judge gave leave to move to enter a nonsuit on any or all of these objections, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff, reserving power to amend the declaration if the Court should think fit.

The present case of King v. Cole was then called on, and it being agreed that the pleadings and facts in all respects were the same as those in Hassall v. Cole, a similar verdict was directed, with similar leave to move. The evidence in Hassall v. Cole to be taken as evidence in King v. Cole.

Knowles moved accordingly, and obtained a rule, on the ground that there was no evidence to support the averment of the release. On the other grounds the Court refused a rule.

On the 22nd of June (1),—

Martin and Tomlinson shewed cause.—The point as to the amendment does not arise in this cause, for though it was not noticed at the trial, there was an admission in the cause of King v. Cole that the plaintiff "had executed the indenture in the declaration mentioned." This puts an end to one part of the difficulty; and the only question remaining is whether there was evidence that the plaintiff "thereby released Wilkinson." The guarantie is an admission by the defendant of "his having released Wilkinson by the indenture;" and though the indenture could not be read, yet an admission by the party in the cause of the legal effect of an instrument is original evidence—Slatterie v. Pooley (2), Howard v. Smith (3). If the indenture had been destroyed, this memorandum would surely have been secondary evidence to go to the jury as to its contents; and unless Slatterie v. Pooley is to be overruled, whatever admission by the party in the cause is secondary evidence of a lost deed, is also original evidence of the effect of the deed, though it be not lost.

Knowles, in support of his rule.—The words of the guarantie must be construed to mean "in consideration that he would release;" that is the sense in which the pleader who drew the declaration has understood them, and, unless they be so understood, the writing discloses no consideration; and the plaintiff should be nonsuited under non assumpsit. It is true that the Court refused to grant a rule to shew cause on the issue of non assumpsit, but that was only because Mr. Baron Parke was afraid that it might be thought that the Court entertained some doubt upon the construction of the writing when none was entertained; and it is clear that the construction of the writing is that the consideration was executory. The evidence shewed that the defendant signed the memorandum, and handed it over to his attorney, and that the attorney, some days afterwards, got the indenture executed.

[ROLFE, B.—Yes; but the effect of his handing the agreement to his attorney merely was to make him his agent, with authority to hand it over to the plaintiff; and the agent having done so, it must be considered as if the defendant himself had at that moment handed it over. It is clear there was no admission until the memorandum passed out of the hands of the defendants' agent. I think the way I put it at the trial was, that the words "in consideration of your having" meant "as soon as you shall have released," and that the jury might, on the evidence, construe the handing over the agreement in exchange for the executed indenture, as a statement, not that the plaintiff had released Wilkinson before the handing over of the agreement, in which case there was no evidence to prove the declaration under non assumpsit, nor that the plaintiff was about to release Wilkinson, in which case there was no evidence to support the other issue, but as a statement that at the same instant the release was contemporaneously executed, in which case there was evidence to go to the jury on both issues.]

ALDERSON, B.—The whole question depends upon what is the true construction of the words in the guarantie? If entirely future, it was no evidence to prove the release. If entirely past, it does not support the declaration. If neither past nor future, but contemporaneous, it does both. We will consult my Brother Parke as to what passed when the rule was moved for.

ALDERSON, B. (June 23) delivered the judgment of the Court.—The question in this case is, whether there is any evidence of the averment in the declaration that the plaintiff by the indenture, dated &c., released the debt due to him from J. Wilkinson. The admissions put in prove that the indenture described in the declaration was executed, but they go no further; they do not shew what the operation of that indenture was. The only evidence of this, suggested by the counsel for the plaintiff, was the guarantie itself. That guarantie was as follows.—[He then read the guarantie, which was in the same terms as that in Hassall v. Cole above set forth.]—This guarantie was signed by the defendant at an antecedent period, but being delivered to his attorney to be handed over to the plaintiff, we think that it must be considered as an admission made by the defendant on the day on which it was so handed over, and is the same as if it had been written or spoken by the defendant at that time. And, if it be so, it is clear that an admission, either verbal or in writing, by him of the contents of a deed would be sufficient proof against him of those contents.

What then is the true construction of the guarantie? If by the words "having released" we are to understand an admission by the defendant that at some antecedent period the plaintiff had released, the guarantie will shew the truth of the averment. But then the declaration would not be proved if this were the true construction. On the other hand, the Court may treat those words as meaning, that if at some future time the plaintiff shall have released the debt the defendant will guarantee the same to him. If this be so, the declaration indeed will be supported; but the admission will not prove the averment that, in fact, such a release was executed by the plaintiff. We think this is the true construction of this guarantie under all the circumstances of this case. It would be sufficient, however, to say that an admission offered by the plaintiff in evidence, but capable equally of either construction, would not be sufficient proof of an averment in a case in which the onus lies on the plaintiff. We think, therefore, that there must be a nonsuit entered.

PARKE, B.—I was not present when cause was shewn against the rule, but I perfectly concur in the judgment now given. The truth is, the plaintiff was in a dilemma. If the construction was put upon the instrument which was necessary to support the declaration, there was no evidence to prove the issue on the release; and if the construction was put upon it that would make it evidence of the release, it would not prove the declaration under non assumpsit, so that the plaintiff must fail either way. But there is no doubt that this instrument did support the declaration, and that the pleader has put the true construction upon it. The word "having" does not refer to the time when the instrument was signed, but to the time when the instalment was to be paid.

Contract, Privity of—Principal and Agent—Partners—Banker—Parties.

There is in general sufficient privity of contract to maintain an action if the party actually making the contract with the defendant was acting for the plaintiff, and intended at the time to make the contract for him, though the defendant was not aware that the contract was made for the plaintiff.

The name in which the contract is made is prima facie evidence of the party for whom the contract was made; but it is not conclusive (except by the custom of trade in the case of bills of exchange). Therefore where two plaintiffs sue on a contract between them and the defendants as bankers, and it appears at the trial that the bank account was opened in the name of one only of the plaintiffs, it is competent for the plaintiffs to prove that the account was opened on behalf of them both; and it is sufficient to maintain the action if it is proved that the plaintiff who actually opened the account at the time intended it to be the account of the two, without shewing that the defendants had before the action any notice that he had so intended. It lies on the plaintiff to prove this intention affirmatively; and the fact that the plaintiffs were partners, and that the money paid into the account belonged to the partnership, is not alone sufficient evidence to go to the jury that the contract was intended to be made on behalf of the two.

This was an action of assumpsit, containing counts on a special contract by the defendants to do their duty as bankers, and also counts for money lent and on an account stated.

Plea (amongst others)—Non assumpsit.

The action came on to be tried, before Platt, B., at the Spring Assizes, 1848, at Taunton, when the plaintiffs were nonsuited, on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury of the plaintiff Cooke being a party to the contract. The evidence on this point was, that the plaintiff Farquhar carried on business under the name of the Bridgewater Coal Company. The plaintiff Cooke was proved to be a partner in this concern, but that fact was not known to the public or to the defendants. The defendants were bankers at Bridgewater, and for some years they had an account with Farquhar. The pass-book, which, as usual, was alternately in the custody of the customer and the bankers, was headed, "John Farquhar, Esq. B.C.C." It was proved that monies belonging to the Bridgewater Coal Company were paid into this account from time to time; and a letter was put in evidence from Farquhar to the defendants in an early part of their connexion, in which he spoke of withdrawing "the company's account." There was no evidence that the defendants ever knew of Cooke before the commencement of the action.

For the defendants it was objected that on this evidence the contract on which the action was brought was exclusively with Farquhar; and Sims v. Brittain (1) and Sims v. Bond (2) were cited. The learned Judge being of opinion that there was no evidence of a joint contract, nonsuited the plaintiffs.

Crowder obtained a rule calling on the defendants to shew cause why there should not be a new trial, against which

Kinglake, Serj., Barstow, and Phinn, on the 29th of June, shewed cause.

[PARKE, B.—The question in this case is one of fact, as to the intention of Farquhar at the time he made the contract with the defendants. If, when he lent the money (for each deposit with a banker is a loan), he meant to lend the money for himself, and not for himself and partner, the two cannot sue; and it does not matter that the money belonged to the two, for Farquhar might intend that the bankers should be responsible to him alone, and be himself to his partner. But if he meant, at the time he made the loan, to make it for himself and partner, the two may sue; and in that case it is no matter whether it was partnership money or not: so that the ownership of the money is not material, except as a circumstance affording an inference as to Farquhar's intention. It is no matter what the defendants knew or intended; for it is well settled law that when an agent makes a contract for an unknown principal, either the principal or the agent may sue. If the defendants believed Farquhar to be the sole contractor, they may have any equities of set-off as if he were the sole contractor; but subject to that, the two may sue. The question for us, therefore, is, whether there was any evidence that the loans were intended to be made on behalf of both the plaintiffs.]

(2) 5 Ibid. 389.

The plaintiff Cooke was, on this evidence, utterly unknown to the defendants up to the time of the commencement of the action. Farquhar only was known to them: and he by the form in which the pass-book is headed, has, in effect, said to the defendants "Know me, and me only, in this matter." He cannot now join with Cooke, in an action contradicting this written assertion. Lucas v. De la Cour (3) was decided on that principle.

[PARKE, B.—Mr. Justice Bayley puts that case on its true ground, that it was evidence; and no doubt the form of the heading of the pass-book in the present case is evidence, and strong evidence, that the contract was intended to be with Farquhar alone, but it is not conclusive.]

In Trueman v. Loder (4) Lord Denman, in delivering judgment, says, "Some cases were quoted in which the question whether an agent or a partner bound himself only, or his principal or firm, has been held to depend on his intention to deal for himself or his partner; but, on examining all those cases it will be found that the contracting party was carrying on two different concerns, one for himself, the other for his principal or firm. The world would know him in two different characters, and each party dealing with him was bound to inquire in which he appeared on any particular occasion." In the present case, Farquhar was known to the world and to the defendants in only one character. And this is an action against a banker on a contract made with him according to the custom of bankers. It would be most inconvenient if a banker was held to contract with any one but the person in whose name the account was opened. If a cheque had been presented, drawn by Farquhar & Cooke, could the bankers have been bound to honour it because Farquhar, in opening an account in his own name, intended to open it for himself and Cooke, though the bankers never heard of him?

[PARKE, B.—No: the contract of the bankers would be to honour cheques drawn in the name of Farquhar. But is there any difficulty in making a contract with the two to honour the drafts of one only?]

In bills of exchange the persons in whose names the contract is made, and those only, are parties to the contract—Emly v. Lye (5), Siffkin v. Walker (6). And here one count is on the contract implied by the commercial usage of bankers, which ought to be construed in the same way as the contract in a bill of exchange, as exclusively personal; and the other is for money lent, which, perhaps, does not lie against a banker at all—Pott v. Clegg (7).

[PARKE, B.—The Chief Baron doubted it, but the majority of the Court held that deposits at a banker's were money lent, creating a present debt from the banker, with a superadded contract to pay the cheques of the customer whilst the banker continued indebted.]

At all events, the contract on which this money was lent was a contract between banker and customer, which is peculiarly personal, as much depends on the individual character of the customer. A banker may have good reasons for being ready to open an account with A. and not willing to open it with B. He should, therefore, have an option, and not be held to have opened an account with one person when he believes himself to be opening an account with another.

[PARKE, B.—I do not think there is any authority for that as a proposition of law: it is a strong observation to a jury, no doubt. Both in Sims v. Brittain and in Sims v. Bond the Court thought that the real customer might sue if he could prove that the account was opened for him. Sims v. Bond decides that the ownership of the money deposited is not sufficient to prove this.]

And there is no more evidence here than in Sims v. Bond. The letters "B.C.C." after Farquhar's name, in the pass-book, were quite unexplained, and may have been inserted for any purpose.

M. Smith, in support of the rule.—It is a general rule that where a contract is made with a partnership in which there is a dormant partner he may be joined as a plaintiff; and though there is an exception in the case of negotiable instruments not made in the name of the partnership, no authority has been cited for saying that a similar exception extends to contracts with bankers. Here there was evidence to go to the jury that the account was opened for the partnership. The letters "B.C.C." placed after Farquhar's name in the pass-book were placed there for some purpose. The plaintiffs say that it was for the purpose of marking that the account was that of the Bridgewater Coal Company; and they prove further by a letter that early in the transactions between Farquhar and the defendants he called it "the account of the company." If it were necessary to prove that the defendants knew that it was the account of the company, that affords some evidence of it; and the fact that the money belonged to the partnership, though not sufficient by itself, strengthens the other evidence.

PARKE, B.—I think that the nonsuit must be set aside. The general rule is not disputed to be that a principal may sue on the contract made in the name of his agent; and I cannot help thinking that there was evidence to go to the jury that Farquhar, in opening this account with the defendants, acted for both the plaintiffs. The case of Sims v. Bond decided that the fact of the money which was paid into a banker's account belonging to particular persons is not evidence that the account was opened for them; but here, in addition to that, there are the letters B.C.C. in the pass-book. I think a jury should decide whether these letters after his name do not shew that in opening the account Farquhar acted for both the plaintiffs; and there is also the letter which was evidence the same way. Then one of the defendant's counsel argued that there is a peculiarity in the contract of a banker which, like the contract in a bill of exchange, is exclusively with those named in the contract. I perfectly agree that very distinct and satisfactory evidence must be given to enable the plaintiffs to prove that what is apparently the contract of the one is really the contract of the two. The name at the head of the bankers' pass-book is not, however, conclusive, as the name in a bill of exchange by the custom of merchants is. Sims v. Bond is an authority that the banking account may be opened, and that it may be shown who is the real customer, though the same case decides that must be proved by more than the mere ownership of the money. Here, I think, there is some evidence to go to the jury, though very probably the defendants on this evidence would have obtained the verdict.

ALDERSON, B.—I agree in thinking that there is a case to go to the jury, though a slight one. The letters B.C.C. are ambiguous. They may have meant Bridgewater Coal Company, and yet have been placed there by Farquhar as a memorandum to enable him to keep his accounts with Cooke, and not showing any intention to open the account for the company. But I think that the writing of "B.C.C." in the pass-book is a fact that should have been left to the jury as evidence whether Farquhar was really acting as agent for both the plaintiffs in opening this account. If he was, the two may sue upon the contract, subject to any equities the defendants may have against Farquhar alone.

PLATT, B.—The letters B.C.C. were not explained at the trial at all. They might have been added merely as a designation to Farquhar. I therefore thought that they afforded no evidence, and I still think there was no case to go to the jury; but I dare say I am wrong, as my two Brothers are of a different opinion, and there must be a new trial.

Nevertheless, the plaintiffs, in fact, say that after the making of the said deed, and whilst the plaintiffs

General demurrer and joinder. The ground of demurrer was, that an action for debt would not lie for the arrears of a rent in fee.

Cowling, in support of the demurrer.—The declaration is bad in substance. Debt does not lie under the circumstances disclosed by this declaration. At common law, it is clear that debt does not lie to recover arrears of a freehold rent, or of an annuity arising out of land—Webb v. Jiggs (1), Kelly v. Clubbe (2). Neither does it lie by reason of the act of parliament, 5 Geo. 4. c. cxxxv. It is true, that by the 17th section of that act (3) a form of conveyance is given, by which the lessees are to enter into the covenant set forth in this declaration; but the effect of this is not to substitute the action of debt for the remedies at common law: and section 19. would appear to shew that no remedy by way of action was intended to be given; but that the remedy was to be by way of distress upon the land itself.

Crompton, contra.—The obligation of the defendant to pay the chief rent to the plaintiffs as overseers for the time being is an obligation created by and dependent upon the act of parliament. This action, therefore, is virtually an action upon the act of parliament, the form of covenant being given by the act; this is, therefore, properly an action of debt. This case does not fall within either of the two technical rules under which it has been held that debt will not lie to recover arrears of a freehold rent. The obligation of the defendant to pay the amount does not arise out of the relation between the parties, or from the permanency of the profits of the estate; it arises out of the express covenant entered into by the defendant with the plaintiffs. This distinguishes the present case from that of Webb v. Jiggs, which has been cited. Secondly, it is submitted, that as the reason formerly given why debt would not lie for the arrears of a rent in fee,—that the law would not suffer a real injury to be remedied by an action merely personal, but that the party must be left to his remedy by action real,—no longer exists, and inasmuch as such actions real are now abolished, the remedy by action of debt is now in force.

By sect. 19. a power of distress was given if the rents should be in arrear for the space of twenty days.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am disposed to think that even upon the last ground suggested by the plaintiff's counsel, this declaration may be supported. It appears to me, that since the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. s. 36. has abolished actions real so far as they are applicable to the recovery of a rent in fee, and inasmuch as there must be a remedy at law in its place, debt would be the proper form of action for that purpose. But it is sufficient for the decision of the present case to say, that inasmuch as the defendant has expressly covenanted with the present plaintiffs to pay them the rent, debt clearly lies for its non-payment.

ROLFE, B.—I quite concur with the Lord Chief Baron in thinking that upon the last ground the judgment of the Court should be in favour of the plaintiffs; but I wish to guard myself from expressing an opinion, that in consequence of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. an action of debt can be brought to recover the arrears of a rent in fee.

Bill of Exchange—Notice of Dishonour—Pleading.

The holder of a dishonoured bill is entitled to recover against an indorser, if he has sent the bill in due time to the place of business of the indorser, for the purpose of giving notice of dishonour, and found it closed and no one there, although no written notice of dishonour was left by him. Such facts do not, however, prove an issue that notice of dishonour was given, for their legal effect is not to give notice, but to dispense with the necessity for giving it, and the pleading must be according to the legal effect.

Semble—That the holder may, if he pleases, elect to treat the absence of the indorser from his place of business as extending the time for giving notice; and that a notice of dishonour given at the place of business, is in time, if given at the first reasonable opportunity afterwards, and that proof of its having been so given will support an averment of due notice having been given.

This was an action of debt. The defendant pleaded that he had drawn a bill, and indorsed it to the plaintiff on account of the debt, that the bill was dishonoured, and that he had not due notice of its dishonour at the time when such notice ought to have been given.

The plaintiff replied, traversing the want of notice, on which issue was joined.

At the trial, before Rolfe, B., at Liverpool Spring Assizes, 1848, it appeared, in evidence, that the plaintiff and the defendant both resided in Manchester. The bill was dishonoured in London, and it was returned to the plaintiff in proper time, on the morning of Tuesday. The plaintiff sent it during business hours on that day to the defendant's counting-house. The messenger found it shut up. He knocked, and no one answering he came away. On the Wednesday he went again, and, according to his account, found nobody there but a boy playing at marbles. No notice was left with this boy. On the Monday following the defendant received formal notice of dishonour, which he said was too late. That was the plaintiff's case. The defendant's counsel, with a view of disproving it, called the defendant's son, a boy, who swore that his father had left Manchester on Tuesday night, and returned on Monday morning, but that the witness remained in charge of the office, and was there constantly during business hours, till his return; and he said that if any notice had been left with him he would have forwarded it. The plaintiff's counsel relied on the knocking at the door on the Tuesday, as being equivalent to notice of dishonour, and cited Crosse v. Smith (1). The learned Judge gave the defendant leave to move to enter a nonsuit if this was no evidence of notice of dishonour; and he left it to the jury to find for the plaintiff, if they believed that the plaintiff sent the bill for the purpose of giving notice of dishonour to the place of business of the defendant, and the messenger, during business hours, knocked and found no one there. The jury found for the plaintiff.

Martin obtained a rule to enter a nonsuit, pursuant to the leave reserved.

Atherton now shewed cause.—The objection taken is, that there is no evidence to prove the averment that notice was given. It is not disputed that the plaintiff did, on the Tuesday, all that, as holder of the bill, he was bound to do; but it is contended, that though the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the bill against the defendant, in consequence of his having sent in proper time to his place of business, and found no one there, yet that should be pleaded as an excuse for not giving notice, not as being notice. This would be so, if, in order to prove notice of dishonour, it was necessary to prove that the notice came to the party; but that is not so. If the holder has discharged his duty by taking the customary steps to send information to the party to the bill, he has "given notice" to him, even though it should be proved affirmatively that the information never did reach him. Thus a letter posted in due time is notice of dishonour, though it miscarry.

[ALDERSON, B.—In a case tried before me, it was proved that the letter containing notice was posted in due time, but that by a mistake of the post-office, the letter was carried to Norwich instead of Warwick, I think, but, at all events, by a circuitous route, so that the defendant did not receive it till three or four days too late, yet that was held to be notice in due time.]

Notice of dishonour is proved by proving facts which shew the holder has done what the law merchant requires him to do in order to make the previous party liable. If the messenger in this case had thrust a written notice through the door, it would have been notice, though it had been proved by the clearest evidence that a stranger had afterwards destroyed the writing, and the defendant never received it. In Crosse v. Smith, Lord Ellenborough, in delivering a considered judgment, says, "That brings it to the question, whether sending the bill by a clerk after ten o'clock, and knocking and waiting at the counting-house door was sufficient notice in point of law, and we think that it was. The period from ten till eleven was a time during which a merchant's counting-house ought to be open, and some person expected to be met with there. The counting-house is a place where all appointments concerning the joint business, and all notices should be addressed, and it is the duty of the merchant to take care that a proper person be in attendance. It has however been argued, that notice in writing left at the counting-house, or put in the post, was necessary; but the law does not require it, and with whom was it to be left? Putting a letter in the post is only one mode of giving notice; but where both parties are residing in the same town, sending a clerk is a more regular and less exceptional mode. The case of Goldsmith v. Bland (2), before Lord Eldon, supports this doctrine. The only notice of the dishonour of the bill was by a clerk of the indorsee, who went to the counting-house of the indorser, found the counting-house shut up, and no person there, saw a servant girl, who said nobody was in the way, and he then returned without leaving any message. Lord Eldon told the jury, that if they thought the indorser was bound to have somebody there, the notice was regular. The jury were satisfied that the hour was a proper hour, and that the defendant ought to have had a clerk there." It may be said that the question in Crosse v. Smith arose under the old general issue, as to whether the bill was satisfaction, and that consequently the decision might be supported without deciding whether what took place was, in legal effect, notice or dispensation from notice; but the remark will not apply to Goldsmith v. Bland, where the plaintiff, in his declaration, must have averred notice, and Lord Eldon have ruled that the averment was proved. And in Crosse v. Smith it is clear that Lord Ellenborough means to say, that the facts there are notice in point of law.

[PARKER, B.—It is necessary to consider whether the precise averment traversed is proved; and if the evidence had stopped at what took place on the Tuesday it would be necessary to decide whether what then took place was in legal effect a dispensation from giving notice of dishonour or notice of dishonour itself. But, assuming it not to be notice of dishonour, and that the plaintiff had a right to treat it as discharging him from taking any further steps, he might also have a right to elect to treat it as giving him further time in which to give notice, and if he did so elect, the formal notice given on the Monday may be notice given in due time within the meaning of the issue.]

Martin, in support of the rule.—The case was never put at the trial in the way now suggested by the Court. If it had been the opinion of the jury would have been asked for as to whether the plaintiff had not an opportunity of delivering notice between the Tuesday and the Monday, by leaving it with the defendant's son, at his counting-house; and though there was some insinuation that he was such a child as to be unfit to receive notice, no doubt the jury would have found for the defendant on that point; but the plaintiff's counsel relied on what took place on Tuesday, and on that alone: and on the motion to enter a nonsuit the Court will consider only the points made at the time leave was given.

(2) Bailey on Bills, 224, n. 100.

(3) 6 B. & C. 367; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. K.E. 366

[Atherton admitted that he did not take the point at the trial.]

Then as to the point actually made. The common sense of mankind revolts at the notion that circumstances shewing that no notice was given, because it could not be given, prove that notice was given. Burgh v. Legge (4) which is a clear authority to that effect, and Carter v. Flower (5). In Crosse v. Smith it was not necessary to consider whether the facts proved amounted to notice of dishonour, or merely shewed that no notice was required, for either would have supported the verdict for the plaintiff there, and so would either here, if the old general issue had been pleaded, but the form of the issue here raises the question. It is said that notices in writing sent, but not received, is notice. That may be so when the writing contains the information which, since Solarie v. Palmer (6), is considered requisite to make a good notice, but not otherwise. It is too absurd for a serious argument to say that knocking at the door of an empty room is notice conveying any information at all; or that the neglect of the defendant in not having a person there is more than an excuse to the holder of the bill for not giving the notice containing that information, which otherwise he must have given. It is an abortive attempt to give notice which, when given, might very likely have been defective. Who can say what the clerk would have said to the defendant if he had found him in?

PARKE, B.—We are agreed that a nonsuit must be entered, but that the plaintiff may have a new trial on payment of costs. The question raised at the trial was, whether what took place on the first day was due notice of dishonour within the meaning of the issue. My Brother Rolfe, on the authority of Crosse v. Smith, thought that it was, but gave leave to move to enter a nonsuit. The case of Solarie v. Palmer has been followed by many other cases, though the strictness of the rule laid down in it has been much modified, particularly by this Court, in the case of Bailey v. Porter (7). Still it is clear that the notice must be such as to convey particular information. That, being so, we must see what was notified, in order to see if it was notice of dishonour. Both Crosse v. Smith, and Goldsmith v. Bland referred to by Lord Ellenborough in his judgment, were decided before this was settled, and in Crosse v. Smith the form of the pleadings was such as not to make the distinction between notice and such circumstances as dispense with notice material, though the same remark does not apply to Goldsmith v. Bland. We agree with the Judges who decided Crosse v. Smith in thinking, that the holder had done all that was requisite to enable him to recover on the bill. A person engaged in trade, who has put his name on a bill by the usage of trade, engages to be in person or by proxy at his place of business during business hours for the purpose of receiving notice of dishonour of the bill, and if the holder goes or sends there in due time for the purpose of giving notice he has done all that he is bound to do; if no one is there to receive notice it is the fault of the other party. But no one being there and no notification being given, the issue that the defendant had notice is not proved. If the plaintiff had sent a writing containing a notification by post, or had left it at the defendant's place of business, it would have been notice of dishonour though it had never been received. But the facts here proved are not notice of dishonour, but merely prove a dispensation from the obligation to give notice.

As the point was not taken at the trial, it is not necessary to decide whether the holder had a right to elect to treat this either as a dispensation from giving notice altogether, or at his option as authorizing him to give notice afterwards. If the holder choose to go again and deliver a notice, it may be that such a notice would prove this issue, as being a notice delivered in due time; but then it would be a question for the jury, whether during the interval he might have delivered notice at the defendant's place of business, but omitted to do so. So that if the plaintiff elected to treat this as a dispensation altogether from giving notice there is an answer to the plea, but it is not rightly pleaded. If he elected to treat it as an excuse for delay, which from the analogy of the cases in which the party could not be found he probably had a right to do, he may treat the subsequent notice as a good one if he had not an opportunity of giving earlier notice; but that point was not taken at the trial. There must, therefore, be a nonsuit; but the plaintiff may have a new trial on payment of costs, if he thinks he can satisfy a jury that the second notice was in time, or he may amend his replication, which is probably the more prudent course.

ALDERSON, B.—Solarie v. Palmer, in effect, decides this case; for as soon as it is settled that a notice of dishonour must be such as to notify some definite matter, it follows that knocking at the door of an empty room cannot be notice.

ROLFE, B.—Since Solarie v. Palmer a notice of dishonour must contain a demand as well as a notice. It is clear that knocking at the door cannot be a demand.

PLATT, B. concurred.

Rule absolute for a new trial on payment of costs of the trial by the plaintiff within a week, the plaintiff to have leave to amend his replication on payment of the costs of the amendment, otherwise to enter a nonsuit.

ESDAILE v. TRUSWELL.

Abatement, Plea in—Affidavit of Verification—Signing Judgment.

A declaration in scire facias stated that J. E., the public officer of a banking co-partnership called the L. and W. Bank, recovered against G. S., the public officer of a banking co-partnership called the L. and W. R. Banking Company, the sum of 51,373l. 12s. 7d., and that the defendant was a member of the said last-mentioned banking company. The defendant pleaded in abatement, that at the very same time when the writ issued, and before the said J. E. declared, the said J. E., public officer, &c. issued a writ of sci. fa. (selling it out). The writ stated that the said J. E., public officer, &c. had recovered judgment from the said G. S., public officer, &c. for the sum of 51,373l. 12s. 7d.; and that one J. D. was at the time of such judgment a member of the last-mentioned banking co-partnership. The plea then stated a declaration in sci. fa. by the said J. E. against the said J. D.; and that the judgment issued against J. D. and that issued against the present defendant were one and the same judgment; that at the time of the judgment against J. D. and the issuing of the writ of sci. fa. against the defendant, J. D. was a member of the banking co-partnership; and it then averred the identity of the two companies described in the two writs as the L. and W. R. Banking Company, and that G. S. was the public officer of the latter company at the time of the judgment; that J. D. was still living, and that the writ and the suit against J. D. were still depending against him.

The affidavit in verification of the plea stated that the paper writing thereunto annexed was a true copy of the issue in the action between J. E. and J. D.; and that judgment was signed in such action by the said J. E. against the said J. D. on &c. for 51,373l. 12s. 7d.:—Held, that a judgment signed by the plaintiff on this plea was regular.

This was a rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the judgment signed herein and all subsequent proceedings should not be set aside, and why an order of Platt, B. should not be rescinded under the following circumstances:—The plaintiff having, on the 8th of June, delivered a declaration in scire facias, and the defendant having demurred thereto, the demurrer was disallowed, and the defendant had leave to amend. He then obtained an order for two days' time to plead, and pleaded in abatement. The plaintiff signed judgment on these grounds:—first, that the order for time to plead did not authorize the defendant to plead in abatement; secondly, that the affidavit verifying the plea in abatement was insufficient. The declaration in scire facias, dated the 8th of June 1847, stated that Joseph Esdaile, a public registered officer of a co-partnership carrying on their business of bankers within sixty-five miles from London, under the style of the London and Westminster Bank, recovered against George Smith, one of the registered public officers of a banking co-partnership, under the style of the Leeds and West Riding Banking Company, who had been summoned to answer the said plaintiff in the sum of 51,373*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, which were adjudged to the said plaintiff for his damages and costs, whereof the said G. Smith was convicted, and that R. Truswell was a member of the said co-partnership. The declaration then stated the command to the sheriffs in the usual way, the return of the sheriffs that the defendant had nothing in their bailiwick, and the plaintiff's prayer of execution.

The defendant pleaded in abatement (on the 29th of November), that at the very same time when the said writ issued, and before the said J. Esdaile declared thereupon, to wit, on, &c., the said J. Esdaile being one of the registered public officers of the co-partnership in the declaration mentioned, &c. issued a writ of sci. fa. in the words following. [The writ was then set out at length, and stated that J. Esdaile, registered officer of, &c. had recovered against G. Smith, the registered public officer of the Leeds and West Riding Banking Company, who had been summoned to answer the said plaintiff in the sum of 51,373*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, which was adjudged to the said plaintiff, and that John Dawson, of Pudsey, near Leeds, at the time of such judgment was, and hitherto hath been and still is a member of the said co-partnership—then followed the usual command to the sheriffs to make known to the said J. Dawson, &c.] The plea then stated the sheriffs' return of nil, and set out at length the declaration in scire facias by J. Esdaile against J. Dawson. The plea then proceeded in these terms, "and the said R. Truswell further says, that the judgment mentioned in the last-mentioned writ of sci. fa., and the judgment mentioned in the said writ of sci. fa. so issued against the said R. Truswell, are one and the same judgment, and not other and different judgments; and that at the time of the recovery of the said judgment, and thence continually up to and at the time of the issuing of the said last-mentioned writ of sci. fa. against the defendant, the said J. Dawson was a member of the said co-partnership, and that the said co-partnership in the said writs of sci. fa. described as the Leeds and West Riding Banking Company were one and the same co-partnership; that at the time of the recovery of the said judgment the said G. Smith was one of the registered public officers of the said co-partnership, and the said co-partnership was a co-partnership of persons united in co-partnership for the purpose of carrying on and then carrying on, the trade or business of bankers in England, according to the provisions of the statute made and passed in that behalf, under and by the style or title of the Leeds and West Riding Banking Company, and that at the time of the recovery of the said judgment the said G. Smith had then been duly nominated and appointed, and then was such registered public officer as aforesaid, by virtue of the statute in that case made and provided; that the said J. Dawson is still alive, and that the said writ of sci. fa. against the said J. Dawson, and the suit so thereby commenced against the said J. Dawson are still depending in the Court of Exchequer, and still are undetermined. Verification and prayer of judgment.

The affidavit in verification of the plea in abatement was as follows:—"In the Exchequer of Pleas, between J. Esdaile, one of the registered public officers of certain persons united in co-partnership for the purpose of carrying on and carrying on the trade or business of bankers in England, under and by the style or title of the London and Westminster Bank, plaintiff, and Richard Truswell, defendant. Andrew Duncan, Clerk to Andrew Duncan, of No. 3, South Square, Gray's Inn, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman, agent for the said defendant in this cause, maketh oath and saith that the paper writing hereto annexed marked (A), is a true copy of the issue wherein the said J. Esdaile as such public officer as aforesaid is the plaintiff, and J. Dawson, of Pudsey, near Leeds, in the county of York, is defendant. And the deponent further saith, that judgment was signed in the last-mentioned cause by the said J. Esdaile as such public officer against the said J. Dawson in this honourable court, on the 15th day of November inst., for the sum of 51,373*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.* damages, and 33*l.* 11*s.* costs, as appears by the judgment book of this honourable Court, which deponent has inspected. Sworn, &c. A. Duncan, jun."

The plaintiff having on the delivery of this plea signed judgment, the defendant, on the 9th of December, obtained a summons to set aside the same for irregularity, which summons was heard by Platt, B. and dismissed. The present rule was then obtained, against which

Bovill shewed cause.—First, the rule to plead gave the defendant no authority to plead in abatement. Secondly, there is no proper affidavit of verification in this case. Great strictness is required in an affidavit in support of a plea in abatement—Onslow v. Booth (1); but the present affidavit is defective and irregular in many particulars.

[PARKE, B.—An affidavit is sufficient that satisfies the conscience of the Court as to the truth of the plea.]

The present affidavit does not effect that object. It does not state in terms or in effect that the judgment recovered against J. Dawson is a judgment in the same action which is now brought against the present defendant, but merely that the names and sums of money are the same. There is nothing to identify either the defendant or the banking company. Then, with respect to the plea in abatement, the first allegation is, that at the time the writ issued, and before Esdaile declared, he issued a writ against a person named Dawson, and then follows an allegation that the sheriff certified that Dawson had nothing in his bailiwick. Neither the plea nor the affidavits shew that the banking companies and the public officers mentioned therein are the same parties.

T. Jones, contra.—The plea is framed on the ground that a writ of sci. fa. may be issued against one or against all the members of a banking co-partnership, but that concurrent writs cannot issue against different persons who were members of the company at the time of judgment obtained—Esdaile v. Lund (2). The defendant contends that he has by his affidavit made out the proposition, that at the time of issuing the writ against the defendant Truswell a writ of the same kind had issued against Dawson, another member of the company. The plea in abatement need not be verified in terms: it is enough if the Court can see from all the facts that are stated, that the actions are identical. The rule on this subject depends on the statute 4 Anne, c. 16. s. 11, which enacts "that no dilatory plea shall be received in any court of record unless the party offering such plea do by affidavit prove the truth thereof, or shew some probable matter to the Court to induce them to believe that the fact of such dilatory plea is true." Adverting to the second branch of this section, the defendant has shewn "probable matter to the Court to induce them to believe" that the fact of the plea is true. The identity of the parties and of the firms is sufficiently shewn on the plea and affidavit.

[PARKE, B.—The defendant has to establish that an action similar to the present has been brought against another party who was a member of the co-partnership, and this he has not shewn. The foundation of his plea is that the writs issued on the same day.]

The defendant has laid before the Court probable cause for believing that the actions are the same.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think this rule must be discharged and with costs. The defendant will not swear that he believes the causes of action to be the same, and if so why should the Court draw that inference?

PARKE, B., ROLFE, B. and PLATT, B. concurred.

Rule discharged, with costs.

1848. } FAVIELL v. THE EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY COMPANY.

Arbitration—Corporation—Railway Company—Attorney, Authority to refer Cause.

An attorney appeared for a corporation in an action of debt, and consented to a Judge's order, referring "all claims made in the action" to an arbitrator. The arbitrator having awarded to the plaintiff a sum actually claimed in the action,—Held, that the question, whether that sum was a debt or not was submitted to the arbitrator, and that his decision on the point was final, even if erroneous.

Held, also, that an attorney authorized to appear for a party in a suit has incidentally authority to refer it without any fresh authority to that effect, and that the attorney having appeared for the corporation, to the knowledge of the directors, the corporation were bound by his acts as attorney, though he was not authorised to appear by an authority under seal.

In this case, the plaintiff had issued a writ in debt against the Eastern Counties Railway Company, who had appeared by an attorney. No further proceedings were taken in the action, but the attorney, who had appeared for the company, consented to a Judge's order, referring "the claims in that action" to an arbitrator. It appeared, by the affidavits, that the plaintiff sought to recover, before the arbitrator, sums between 3,000*l.* and 4,000*l.*, which, it was admitted, were debts, and a sum of 10,307*l.*, which the railway company contended, if recoverable at all, was to be recovered as unliquidated damages, and not as a debt; and consequently, as they contended, this was not included in the submission. The arbitrator made his award, directing the company to pay the plaintiff 14,410*l.* 7*s.* It appeared, by the affidavits, that the directors of the company were aware that the attorney had appeared for the company; but that he had no authority under seal to appear, and was not expressly authorized by the directors to refer the action.

In last term, a rule had been obtained, under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, calling on the company to shew cause why they should not pay to the plaintiff 14,410*l.* 7*s.*, the amount awarded to him.

Martin, Willes, and Prentice now shewed cause.—The Court in last term refused to set aside this award (1), but the company are desirous of raising the questions on the record; and the Court will not decide a question involving so large an amount in a summary manner, without appeal, but will rather put the plaintiff to bring his action.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The decision of this Court is an authority against you; but if, notwithstanding that, you can raise any doubt in any one member of the Court as to whether you may not plead with success a defence to an action on this award, we ought not to decide in this summary manner without an appeal.]

The reference in this case was solely of the action, which was in debt, and gave the arbitrator no authority to decide on anything which was not a debt. The decision of the arbitrator, though erroneous, is conclusive on all matters submitted to him, but he cannot enlarge his jurisdiction by an erroneous decision as to what his jurisdiction is. Suppose that an action of debt, and only an action of debt, being referred to him, he had adjudicated on an action for an assault, and had decided that that was a debt, could it be said that the parties were to be bound by such an award? The arbitrator is, in this respect, like an inferior court, which cannot give itself jurisdiction by its erroneous finding—Roberts v. Humby (2). On this principle the Court of Queen's Bench quashes convictions, when the Justices have acted without jurisdiction, though they have erroneously decided that they have jurisdiction, or grants a mandamus to compel them to entertain a complaint, though they have erroneously decided that they have no jurisdiction, yet the decision of a Justice on a matter within his jurisdiction is as conclusive as an award on matters within the submission.

[ALDERSON, B.—The arbitrator must, no doubt, come to a determination as to whether a matter is within the submission or not; but that depends on the construction of the submission, which is also for the Court; and it is not competent for the arbitrator to exclude the power of the Court to construe the submission by the way he draws up his award, not stating the point on the face of it.]

And that is matter for a plea to the action on the award. The defendants may plead that facts not stated on the face of the award exist, and avoid it either by shewing, as in Mitchell v. Staveley (3), that he has not decided all that he ought, or as here, that he has decided more than he ought, and that the bad and the good part of the award cannot be separated. This appears to be old law—Vin. Abr. 'Arbitrament,' D, 6 and 7. Besides, the remedy here sought is substituted for that of attachment, and the Courts have held that it is to be governed by the same rules, and an attachment could not have gone against a corporation.

[ALDERSON, B.—The discretion of the Court is guided by the same rules in granting or refusing such an order as in granting or refusing an attachment; but it would be a very literal application of that rule to say such an order could not go against a corporation.]

Secondly, there was no submission to bind the company: it is a corporation, and can only submit by an instrument under seal, and cannot even appoint an attorney save by instrument under seal—The King v. the City of Chester (4); and even if he were duly made their attorney, he is not as such authorized to refer a cause. The only authority for saying he is, is a dictum in Filmer v. Delber (5); and it is contrary to all principle that an agent should have power to bind his principal in spite of him.

[PLATT, B.—As between attorney and client it may be so; but surely the attorney, if duly constituted, has authority to bind his client as to third persons. If he has properly appeared he needs no fresh authority to take proper and ordinary steps in the cause.]

shews that a submission by an attorney, who appeared for an infant, is void.

[ALDERSON, B.—An infant cannot in any way appoint an attorney; and in such a case the plaintiff knows, or ought to know this, and cannot be deceived. But a corporation can appoint an attorney; and if we permitted a corporation to set aside proceedings on this ground we should enable them to cheat all round. In Bayley v. Buckland (7) this Court laid down the rule, that where a defendant had notice of an action having been brought against him, he should be bound by an attorney who appeared in his name, though without authority: otherwise where there is no notice. Here the corporation had ample notice.]

The Attorney General, contra, called the attention of the Court to the terms of the submission, which was "of all claims in the action," and to part of the affidavits, shewing that the sum in dispute was claimed in the action, so that the question referred was really debt or no debt. (He was then stopped by the Court.)

POLLOCK, C.B.—If the point, as to whether the arbitrator has gone out of his jurisdiction or not, really arose, the Court would probably not decide the question in a summary proceeding; but it does not arise. The arbitrator has decided the point referred to him, which was the question whether this claim was a debt or not. As to the other point made, that an attorney appearing for a corporation cannot bind it by submitting to a reference, without an authority under seal, the Court would grasp at anything rather than sanction a doctrine so mischievous and unjust.

ALDERSON, B.—I was at first much struck by the argument that the arbitrator could not conclusively decide what was the extent of his jurisdiction; and I still think he could not. But on looking at the terms of the submission it appears to have been of all claims in the action of debt; and from the affidavits it appears that this sum of 10,307*l.* was claimed in the action, and that the company attended the reference before the arbitrator after this claim was made and entertained before him. Then was the time for them to apply to a Judge to revoke his authority, on the ground that he was exceeding his authority, if he really was doing so, which must depend on the construction of the submission, which gives him authority. Instead of doing so, they lie by, and take the chance of an award in their favour. The arbitrator has decided that this "claim" is a debt, and that was the very point submitted to him, on which, therefore, his decision is final. As to the other point it would be monstrous if parties suing a corporation were bound to seek for an authority under seal given to the attorney for each step. They would be grievously injured if that was the case.

ROLFE, B. concurred on both points.

PLATT, B.—I think that an attorney who has been duly authorized to appear for a litigant has incidentally authority to conduct the cause, and to refer it. If he does wrong he may be responsible to his client; but his client is bound. In the present case the attorney in fact appeared for the company; the company had notice that he had done so, and did not interfere, but suffered the proceedings to go on; and I think they are now estopped from denying that he was duly authorized to appear for them. As to the other point I concur.

May 31. } PRATT v. PRATT AND OTHERS.

Pleading—Trespass to Goods—Conversion—Matter of Aggravation.

A declaration in trespass to goods charged the defendant with taking and carrying them away, and also with converting them to his own use:—Held, that such conversion was merely matter of aggravation, and a plea to the whole declaration justifying the taking the goods and carrying them away, but omitting to justify their conversion, was a good plea.

Trespass. The declaration alleged that the defendants, on &c., with force and arms, &c., broke and entered a certain dwelling-house of the plaintiff, and then in the plaintiff's occupation, and then made a great noise and disturbance therein, and stayed and continued therein making such noise and disturbance for a long time, to wit, &c., and then forced and broke open, broke to pieces and damaged divers, to wit, two windows of the plaintiff, &c. of great value, &c., and also during the time aforesaid, &c., with force and arms seized and took divers goods and chattels of the plaintiff, to wit, &c., then found and being in the said dwelling-house, &c., and carried away the same, and converted and disposed thereof to their own use. By means of which several premises the plaintiff and his family were during all the time aforesaid not only greatly disturbed and annoyed in the peaceable possession of the said dwelling-house of the plaintiff, but the plaintiff was also during all that time hindered and prevented from carrying on and transacting therein his lawful and necessary affairs and business, &c.

The defendants pleaded, thirdly, to the whole declaration, that the said dwelling-house in which, &c., at the said time when, &c., was the dwelling-house, soil and freehold of one T. P, whereupon the defendants as the servants of the said T. P. and by his command broke and entered the said dwelling-house in which, &c., at the said time when, &c., and because the goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned, and every part thereof, at the said time when, &c., were and was in and upon the said dwelling-house in which, &c., incumbering the same, they, the defendants, as the servants of the said T. P. and by his command, in order to remove the said incumbrances, seized and took the said goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned, and then carried and conveyed the same away from and off the said dwelling-house in which, &c., to a small and convenient distance in that behalf, and there left the same for the plaintiff as they lawfully might for the cause aforesaid, which were the said alleged trespasses in the declaration mentioned. Verification.

Special demurrer, assigning for cause that the plea professed in the commencement thereof to be an answer to the whole declaration, yet that, although the declaration alleged that the defendants converted and disposed of the said goods and chattels to their own use, the said plea did not state or shew any answer to that part of the declaration.

Pigott, in support of the demurrer.—The plea affords no answer to that part of the declaration which charges the defendants with having converted the plaintiff's goods. The facts alleged in the plea only justify the seizing them and carrying them away; not the conversion.

[PLATT, B.—But is not the conversion mere matter of aggravation?]

In this declaration it is treated as a distinct act of trespass; and as the plea professes to answer all the trespasses alleged in the declaration, it should have in terms justified the conversion. The taking away a party's goods is not necessarily a conversion—Fouldes v. Willoughby (1).—He also cited Smith v. Edge (2), Oxley v. Watts (3), Gregory v. Hill (4), Woods v. Durrant (5), Davison v. Wilson (6).

Phipson, contra, was stopped by the Court.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all agreed that this plea is sufficient. The only trespasses in the declaration which required an answer were the breaking into the dwelling-house, and the taking and carrying away the plaintiff's goods. The conversion of the goods was merely matter of aggravation.

a copy of the marriage register was put in evidence, and a witness was called who stated that he was acquainted with one J. G., that he had inspected the original register, and that one of the signatures to it was in the handwriting of the J. G. whom he knew:—Held, that this was evidence of the identity of J. G., without the original register being produced.

This was an action by the drawer against the acceptor of a bill of exchange.

At the trial, before Parke, B., at the last Middlesex Sessions, the defendant's case was proved by putting in evidence an examined copy of the register of a marriage between the defendant and one Joseph Glossop, and by the evidence of a witness who knew a Joseph Glossop and his handwriting, and who having seen the original marriage register, swore that the signature to it was in the handwriting of the Joseph Glossop with whom he was acquainted, and who was then alive. The counsel for the defendant objected that the original register should have been produced, but the learned Judge overruled the objection, and the jury accordingly found a verdict for the defendant.

M'Mahon now moved for a new trial.—The original register ought to have been produced. The only mode by which the witness could speak to the fact of the defendant having married Joseph Glossop was by the signature to the original register. Without its production the jury could have no means of being satisfied of the accuracy of the witness's testimony.

On the trial of indictments for bigamy the original register is produced.

[PARKE, B.—I have tried, perhaps, more cases of bigamy than any other Judge, and I do not recollect one in which the original register was produced at the trial.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that this rule should be refused, upon the ground that the person who has the legal charge of the register cannot be called upon to produce it, and that in his absence it is for the jury to say what degree of weight and value they can give to the evidence of a witness who speaks to the handwriting of a document which is not before them. Suppose the question was, whether a certain person was at a particular place on a given day, and a witness was called, who said, "I know that person; he is the churchwarden of my parish, and on that day I saw a notice stuck on the church door, the signature to which was in his handwriting." That would be evidence, because the notice itself not being able to be removed could not be produced in court. Now if in point of law you cannot compel a party who has the custody of a document to produce it, there is the same reason for admitting other evidence of its contents as if its production were a physical impossibility.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion, and, using a similar illustration to that given by my Lord, will suppose that seditious or treasonable placards had been posted up, and a witness were to state that the handwriting of these placards was that of A. B.; that would clearly be evidence against A. B, upon the ground that the thing itself could not be produced. .

PLATT, B.—The only difficulty which arises in the case is this, that suppose the signature to the register to be a forgery, the plaintiff would have no means of shewing that to be so, unless the original register were produced. That is certainly some inconvenience; but, on the other hand, as the production of the document was not possible, I think the evidence given was admissible.

PARKE, B.—For the purpose of preserving parochial registers, the law allows parties to prove their contents by producing in evidence an examined copy, and dispenses with the production of the original register. Now, to prove the identity of a person, you may shew that in consequence of a particular mark, B, appearing upon the register, such a person was present at the time the entry in question was made upon it. In the present case a witness swore that he had seen the original register, and that one of the signatures to it was that of a James Glossop, whom he knew: that was evidence that this James Glossop was the person who then married the defendant. In all cases it is doubtful whether the party who has the custody of the register will produce it; and I take it to be quite clear that he is not bound to produce it under a subpœna duces tecum. But in any event its absence is only matter of observation to the jury as to the degree of weight to be attached to the evidence of a witness who speaks to a mark existing upon a document which is not before the jury.

Feb. 6. } CURLING v. WOOD.

Case — Duty — Wharfinger — Mooring Vessels.

A declaration in case for damage done to the plaintiff's vessel, stated that the defendant possessed a wharf on the Thames, near which there was a wood-work, placed there by the defendant, and being at the bottom of the river, and over which the after-mentioned ship at certain states of the tide would float, but not at other states of the tide; that the plaintiff was possessed of a ship then being by sufferance of the defendant at and alongside the wharf for reward to the defendant in that behalf; that the defendant had the management and controul of the wharf, and the mooring and stationing of ships at and near it whilst they were at the wharf for the purpose of using it. Breach, that the defendant unskilfully, &c. placed, moored and stationed the plaintiff's ship in the river, near the wharf and over the wood-work, and detained it there for a long and improper time, and until the ship, on the fall of the tide, struck against the wood-work, and thereby was greatly injured. Plea, that the defendant had not the management and controul of the wharf, and the mooring and stationing of ships, &c. modo et formâ.

On error, the judgment of the Court below was affirmed; and it was held, that the declaration sufficiently shewed a duty on the part of the defendant safely to moor and station the vessel, and a breach of it.

Error from the Court of Exchequer.

Case. The declaration stated that before and at the time when, &c. the defendant (the plaintiff in error) was possessed of a certain wharf for the loading and unloading of ships and vessels on the banks of the river Thames, near to which said wharf there then was certain wood-work before then by the defendant placed, and then being at and upon the bottom of the said river, over which said wood-work, at certain states of the tide of the said river, the ship or vessel hereinafter mentioned would float, but at other states of the said tide the said ship or vessel would not float, of all which premises the defendant before and at, &c. had notice; that at the time when, &c., and while the defendant was so possessed of the said wharf as aforesaid, the plaintiff was possessed of a certain ship or vessel of great value, to wit, &c., then being by sufferance and permission of the defendant at and alongside the said wharf for reward to the defendant in that behalf, and the defendant then had the management and controul of the said wharf, and the mooring and stationing of ships and vessels at and near the same, whilst such ships and vessels were at the said wharf for the purpose of using the same; yet the defendant, to wit, on &c., unskilfully, negligently and improperly placed, moored and stationed the said ship or vessel of the plaintiff in the part of the said river near the said wharf, and over the said wood-work, and unskilfully, negligently and improperly detained the said ship or vessel there over the said wood-work for a long and improper time, and until the said ship or vessel on the day and year aforesaid, upon the natural and usual fall of the tide in the said river, came, fell, and lodged upon and struck against the said wood-work at the bottom of the said river, and there remained and continued upon and striking against the said wood-work for a long time, to wit, &c. and thereby then became and was greatly strained, bilged, broken and injured, &c.

Third plea, denying that the defendant had the controul of the wharf, and of the mooring and stationing of vessels.

At the trial, before Platt, B., at the London Sittings after Easter term, 1846, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff on the third plea. A rule nisi for arresting the judgment having been refused by the Court of Exchequer (1), the defendant below brought a writ of error on the judgment.

Cleasby, for the plaintiff in error (the defendant below), Feb. 6th, 1848 (2).—The declaration which charges the wharfinger with unskilfully mooring a vessel at an improper place, discloses no duty for the breach of which he is responsible. The question is an important one; and it is quite a new thing to attempt to make a wharfinger liable for an accident which has happened to a ship in the river when moored at his wharf. There is a well-known distinction between docks and wharves. Ships in dock are in the custody and under the charge of the dock-owners; but ships moored at a wharf are not under the charge or custody of the wharfinger.

It is not stated that the defendant was employed to moor or station the ship, or that there was any reward to him for so doing; but that the vessel was alongside the wharf for reward to the defendant. This statement does not involve any duty on the part of the defendant to do any act relative to mooring. The object for which wharves are constructed is not the mooring of vessels. Wharfage is chargeable for laying goods upon the wharf — Stephen v. Coster (3).

There is no allegation of any duty except that of a wharfinger. There was no del-very over of the ship into the care of the defendant.

[WILDE, C.J.—It appears that the plaintiff parted with his controul as to mooring the ship.]

It cannot be urged that by virtue of the defendant's employment as a wharfinger, the duty of mooring was cast upon him. It can only be argued, that the allegation as to the mooring implies an employment by the plaintiff of the defendant for the purpose of mooring.

[WILDE, C.J.—The declaration states, and the verdict finds, that the defendant had the management of the mooring and stationing. That excludes everybody else.

[ERLE, J.—And it implies an undertaking to use ordinary care in doing it.]

[WILLIAMS, J.—If we can give a construction to the allegation which will support the verdict, that construction must be given to it after verdict.]

The statement of negligence in the declaration is nothing of itself, unless the relation of the parties raised a duty binding on the defendant to use due care—Priesley v. Fowler (4).

Martin, for the defendant in error, was not called upon.

WILDE, C.J.—There is little doubt that the declaration is perfectly sufficient. What is it that is alleged as evidence of the claim for indemnity against the wrong which the plaintiff suffered? It is stated that the wharf was used for profit, that it was prepared in a certain manner, and that the vessel was alongside for reward to the defendant. It may be that wharfingers are not generally bound to moor ships. Different wharfingers may carry on their business in different manners. They may gain a profit from the mooring. The declaration here states that the defendant had the management and controul of the wharf and the mooring and stationing of vessels at or near it. What can be the meaning of having the stationing but controuling the place where the ship was to be placed? Then it is stated that the defendant unskillfully, negligently, and improperly placed and stationed the vessel in a part of the river near the wharf, and over the wood-work which had been placed there by the defendant; and then that he unskillfully, negligently, and improperly detained the vessel over the said wood-work for an improper time, till the vessel, upon the fall of the tide, lodged and struck upon it, and so was damaged. The effect of the whole statement in the declaration is, that the defendant, being proprietor of the wharf, the plaintiff came to use it for the profit of the defendant; that the defendant, who knew the condition of the wharf, placed the plaintiff's vessel where it was greatly injured. Is not that a state of things which creates the right to indemnity stated in the declaration? If such right is denied, the declaration might have been demurred to; but after the verdict how are we to construe it? Are we to look out for difficulties in the construction? It would be doing violence to language not to support the verdict. I think there is a good statement of such a relation between the parties as brought a responsibility on the defendant. The declaration states that he had the controul, and chose to place and station the vessel where it received an injury. I cannot see any just foundation for the doubt that wharfingers are not bound safely and securely to moor. That may be the case generally; but in this case the defendant chooses to moor for profit, and in doing so he unskillfully does that which causes the damage. I think, therefore, that he is responsible for that damage, and that the judgment of the Court below was correct.

to the defendants three acceptances as follows:—16*l.* 6*s.* at two months, 21*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* at three months, and 26*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*, dated the 7th of April, at five months, as full settlement of debts, the defendants promised the plaintiff to return to him the acceptances drawn by the said defendant as follows:—28*l.* 15*s.* and 28*l.* Breach, that the defendants did not return the acceptances:—Held, on special demurrer, that the declaration was ill for want of certainty.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that the plaintiff had divers dealings with the defendant Crouch alone, and also with Crouch and the defendant Arrowsmith; that divers accounts remained unsettled between the plaintiff and the defendants; that the plaintiff had, for the accommodation of Crouch, accepted divers bills of exchange, and thereupon, to wit, on &c. in consideration that the plaintiff, at the defendants' request, then delivered to the defendants three acceptances as follows:—16*l.* 6*s.* at two months, 21*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* at three months, and 26*s.* 7*s.* 11*d.*, dated the 7th of April, at five months, as full settlement of debts, the defendants promised the plaintiff to return to him the acceptances drawn by the said Crouch, as follows:—28*l.* 15*s.* and 28*l.*, and to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 15*l.* towards a bill of exchange, drawn by the defendant Crouch, for 30*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*, which would become due on the 10th of May 1846. Breach, that the defendants did not, nor would return the said acceptances, or pay to the plaintiff the said sum of 15*l.*

Demurrer, assigning for causes that no sufficient consideration was shewn for the defendants' promise; that the acceptances delivered to the defendant may have been worthless; that the declaration was defective in certainty in not stating the names of the parties whose acceptances were delivered to the defendant. Joinder therein.

J. Brown, in support of the demurrer.—The declaration is bad. First, there is no valid consideration for the defendants' promise. The consideration is not connected with the inducement; it does not appear whose "accounts" remained unsettled, nor whether the "debts" mentioned in the declaration were those of the plaintiff or of third parties. Again, assuming the debts to be those of the plaintiff, sufficient facts are not stated to shew that the giving of the acceptances operated as a settlement of debts. It does not appear whether the bills of exchange equalled the debts, or whether the bills were negotiable. The authorities in support of this portion of the argument are Cumber v. Wane (1), Sibree v. Tripp (2), and James v. Williams (3). Secondly, the declaration is not sufficiently certain. It does not even state who are the acceptors of the bills. Appelmans v. Blanche (4) shews that the omission of the christian names of persons mentioned in pleading, unless it be excused by averment, is bad on special demurrer. He cited, as to another point, Lynn v. Bruce (5) and Reeves v. Hearne (6).

Manning, Serj. contrà.—The declaration is good. First, there is a valid consideration for the defendants' promise. Whatever may be the nature of the acceptances, the parties have treated them as a settlement of debts; and whether they be of any value or not the mere delivery of them to the defendants is an act of labour sufficient to support the declaration.

June 9. } OTHER.

*A declaration stated that, by an indenture between the plaintiff and the defendants, the plaintiff sold certain letters patent to the defendants, and that the defendants covenanted to pay the price by instalments: provided, that if within twelve months from the date of the indenture the defendants should disapprove of the patent, and of their disapprobation and intention to sell it they should give notice to the plaintiff, the payment of the instalments should be suspended; and if the defendants should within six months after notice sell the said patent, and retaining to themselves 246*l.* pay over the surplus to the plaintiff, the covenant for payment of the entire sum should cease. But if the defendants having given such notice should neglect or refuse to observe all the other matters or things in the proviso, the covenant for payment of 840*l.* should stand. Averment, that the defendants gave due notice of their disapprobation and of their intention to sell, and that the defendants had not sold the letters patent. Breach, non-payment of the instalments. Plea, that the defendants were ready and willing and endeavoured to sell the letters patent, but that no bonâ fide sale could be effected:—Held, that the defendants not having sold the letters patent were liable to pay the instalments.*

should give notice in writing to the plaintiff, such notice not to be given before the 1st of March 1837 or after the 31st of March 1837, then and in such case the payment of the first instalment should be suspended; and if having given such notice the defendant should within six months after the date thereof bonâ fide sell and dispose of the said letters patent to any person willing to purchase the same for the best price that could be reasonably obtained, and out of the produce of such sale pay the costs of such sale, and retain to themselves 246*l.* and pay over to the plaintiff the net surplus, if any, then and in such case the covenant and agreement for payment of 840*l.* should cease and determine. But if the defendants should neglect to give such notice, or having given such notice should neglect or refuse to observe all the other matters and things in the said proviso contained, then the covenant for payment of 840*l.* as aforesaid should be and stand in full force, and the said first instalment of 120*l.*, in case the same should have been suspended by the notice, should, at the expiration of the six calendar months from such notice, revive and be payable. Averment, that the defendants gave due notice of their disapprobation of the said letters patent and of their intention to sell the same; that six months from the date of the notice elapsed before the suit; and that the defendants had not bonâ fide sold the said letters patent or rendered the plaintiff an account of the sale, or of the costs, or of the net surplus. Breach, the non-payment by the defendants of any portion of the said sum of 840*l.*

The defendants pleaded, lastly, that after the giving the notice in writing to the plaintiff of the defendants' disapprobation of the said letters patent, and of their intention to sell the same, and within and during the period of the said six months after the expiration of the notice, the defendants were ready and willing, and endeavoured and offered bonâ fide to sell the said letters patent for the best price that could be reasonably obtained by public auction, but that no person would become the purchaser, and no bonâ fide sale could be effected; that during the said six months, and since, the defendants have been unable to sell the same; that the said letters patent have remained unsold without any default and against the will of the defendants; that the same have been and always were valueless and useless, and it has been impossible to sell and dispose of the same.

Demurrer, assigning, amongst others, the following causes—that although by the covenant the defendants bound themselves to make the payments, except in the events specified in the proviso, yet the plea does not allege the happening of those events, but admits that those events failed, and merely alleges that the failure did not arise from the negligence or default of the defendants. Joinder therein.

T. Jones, in support of the demurrer.—The defendants not having sold the letters patent within the six months are liable to pay the instalments, and it is no answer for them to say that they endeavoured to sell them, but were unsuccessful.

C. E. Pollock, contra.—It is a sufficient answer for the defendants to shew that they endeavoured to sell the letters patent, but were unable to do so. The construction contended for by the other side leads to an absurdity, for it tends to shew that if the defendants had sold the letters patent for the small sum of 50*l.* they would have discharged themselves from their liability to the instalments, and might have retained to their own use the produce of the sale. Again, the words of the proviso are: if the defendants should “neglect or refuse to observe” the matters or things in the proviso they shall pay 840*l.*, that means if they shall wilfully neglect or refuse; but here they have not been guilty of any wilful neglect or refusal, as they have used their best endeavours to sell the patent.

T. Jones was not called on to reply.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The plea is bad, and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. The defendants contend that it is to be considered as implied in the bargain, that if the patent cannot be sold it is the same thing as if it were sold. That indeed might be so if the patent had been repealed by scire facias by means of a third person, or if it were the case of a chattel that had been destroyed, because it is an implied condition in such a case that the thing shall remain in specie. But the plea in this case states merely, that notwithstanding the defendants’ efforts the article remained unsold. We cannot extract from the plea those facts which are necessary to give effect to the argument of the defendant’s counsel. The defendants have given notice of their intention to sell the letters patent, and so far have suspended their liability to pay the first instalment. But they have not complied with the rest of the agreement. It is said, indeed, that they have not been guilty of a wilful neglect or refusal to sell the patent, because they have used their best endeavours to dispose of it. But, in my opinion, the meaning of the covenant is that they shall actually sell it; and as they have not sold it, they have rendered themselves liable to pay the instalments.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. The defendants have bound themselves by indenture to pay a certain sum for a patent. The indenture of sale contains a proviso that the payments are not to be absolute if the defendants give a certain notice and do certain acts; but if they neglect to do those acts, they are liable to pay the instalments. The condition of their ceasing to pay the instalments is that they do the acts. Here, however, they aver, not that they did the acts, but merely that they endeavoured to do them. The plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion. It is contended, on behalf of the defendants, that the plaintiff’s construction of this covenant is productive of hardship on the defendants. I do not assent to that, but I think that the hardship lies on the other side. It is consistent with this covenant that the day after the expiration of the six months’ notice, the defendants may sell this patent for 10,000*l.*, in which case the plaintiff would not be entitled to the net surplus after payment of the expenses. It is argued that the defendants are liable to pay the instalments only in the event of their being guilty of a wilful neglect to give notice or to sell; but the word “neglect” means “omit,” and therefore the defendants having omitted to sell are liable to pay the instalments.

PLATT, B.—The indenture contains a proviso, that if the defendants do certain acts they shall not be liable to pay the instalments: they have not done the acts, therefore they are liable to pay.

Feb. 7. } WAIT AND ANOTHER v. BAKER.

Contract—Sale of Goods—When Property passes—Delivery under Bill of Lading—Appropriation.

An "appropriation" of goods under a contract of sale may mean a mere election by the vendor, where he has the right himself to choose what articles he will supply in performance of his contract, in which case the property does not pass; or it may mean that both parties to the contract have agreed that particular goods shall be the articles to be supplied, and yet the appropriation may not operate so as to pass the property. But where both parties have agreed that particular goods shall be the article contracted for and shall become the property of the vendee, and nothing further remains to be done in order to transfer the goods, that is an appropriation which operates in law so as to vest the property in the vendee.

Under a contract for the sale of goods, to be selected by the vendor, a selection and a delivery to a common carrier for the vendee is a delivery to the vendee, whose agent the carrier becomes; and if there is a binding contract, and the article agrees with it, such delivery is such an appropriation as leaves nothing more to be done in order to transfer the goods, and therefore the property passes. But in the case of a delivery on board a ship under a bill of lading the captain is in possession of the goods, and carries for and on behalf of the vendor, and the delivery does not operate as in the case of a common carrier, though the ship be expressly hired for the vendee: it is an appropriation only in the sense of an election, and does not vest the goods in the vendee.

Under a contract for the sale and delivery of barley, to be according to sample, for cash on receipt of bill of lading, the vendor at the request of the vendee procured a ship for him, and sent him the charter-party, and he insured the ship. The vessel was loaded and the captain gave a bill of lading to the vendor, who had written to the vendee—"I hope to be able to send you the invoice and bill of lading on Wednesday." A day or two after, the vendor called and left the invoice and unindorsed bill of lading with the vendee; but afterwards, upon the vendee expressing himself dissatisfied with the samples from the cargo, though he did not refuse to accept it, and tendered the price, the vendor took away the bill of lading and indorsed it to other parties. The vendee having on the arrival of the ship obtained part of the cargo,—Held, that the property in the barley had not passed to the vendee, and that the indorsees of the bill of lading were entitled to recover the value in an action of trover against the vendee.

Trover for 500 bushels of barley.

Pleas—First, not guilty; and second, not possessed.

The cause was tried, before Williams, J., at the Somersetshire Spring Assizes, 1847, when the following appeared to be the facts of the case:—The defendant, who was a corn-factor at Bristol, having occasionally had dealings with a corn-factor at Plymouth, of the name of Lethbridge, wrote to him there from Bristol, on the 5th of December 1846, as follows—"I hear that the crop of barley in the south of Hampshire is good this year, and that at Kingsbridge the price is low compared with the markets further eastward. If you are doing anything in the article this season, and can make me an offer of a cargo, I have no doubt but we may have a transaction. Let me hear from you in due course. Send me sample in letter describing weight, &c." On the 9th Lethbridge wrote, in answer—"I beg to inform you I have not yet commenced buying barley in the Kingsbridge market, farmers there standing out for 10s. a bag. After Saturday's market I will send you a sample and an offer, if possible." On the 14th Lethbridge wrote to the defendant as follows—"I herewith hand you samples of common and chevalier barley of the neighbourhood of Kingsbridge, and will engage to sell you from 400 to 500 quarters f. o. b. at Kingsbridge or neighbouring port, at 40s. per quarter common, and 42s. per quarter chevalier, in equal quantities, for cash on handing bills of lading, or acceptance at two months' date adding interest at the rate of 5l. per cent. per annum, subject to your reply by course of post." On the 16th the defendant replied—"I beg to accept your offer of 250 quarters of chevalier barley at 42s. per quarter, and 250 quarters common at 40s. per quarter, f. o. b., for cash payments on receipt of bill of lading and invoice, the quality of which to be equal to the samples received from you to-day." On the 18th Lethbridge wrote to the defendant—"Your favour of the 16th is duly to hand, and note by it your acceptance of my offer of barley. I suppose I am to take up a vessel at the least possible freight I can get her for; please instruct me in this, and say if for Bristol or any other port." On the 19th the defendant wrote in answer—"I took it for granted that you would get a vessel for the barley I have bought of you, f. o. b., and therefore did not instruct you to seek one. I trust that you will be particular to select a good ship, and at the lowest possible freight for this port, and, above all, take care that the quality of the barley is fully equal to sample. A party who will take part of it is extremely particular in these matters, and the samples are sealed and held in the custody of a third party. Please to advise when you have taken up a vessel, with particulars of the port she loads in, so that I may get insurance done correctly." After some further correspondence respecting the amount of freight, Lethbridge wrote on the 23rd to the defendant, saying, "I now send you copy of charter-party of the Emerald, which vessel will sail for the port of loading to-day or to-morrow, and I will lose no time in getting her loaded." The defendant, by letter, dated the 24th, acknowledged the receipt of the charter-party, which was dated on the 22nd, not under seal, and was in the name of Lethbridge, to load at Dartmouth, a portion to be filled up at Salcombe, to proceed to Bristol, and deliver on payment of freight. On the 28th Lethbridge wrote to the defendant—"the Emerald will commence loading to-day. I hope to hand you bill of lading in the course of the week." And, again, on the 1st of January 1847—"I hope to be able to send you invoice and bill of lading of Emerald on Tuesday or Wednesday." Also on the 6th of January he wrote to the defendant—"The Emerald is nearly loaded; expect the bill of lading to-day or to-morrow. I expect to be in Exeter on Friday, when it is very likely I shall run down and see you." The vessel was loaded with chevalier and common barley; and on the 7th of January Lethbridge received from the master the bill of lading of the cargo, which was therein expressed to be deliverable at Bristol to the order of Lethbridge, on assigns paying the freight as per charter. On the 8th Lethbridge was at Bristol, and called upon the defendant at his office there, and left with him the invoice and unindorsed bill of lading. He returned in about four hours, when after objection made by the defendant to take the cargo at the contract price, because he considered the samples produced from the cargo were of inferior quality to those previously sent, a tender of the contract price was made under protest; but Lethbridge asserting the quality of the samples from the bulk to be equal to the previous sample, declined the money unless it was to be in final settlement. The defendant expressed himself dissatisfied with the barley, but said "I accept the cargo," and he tendered Lethbridge the price in money. Lethbridge, however, said he would not settle with the defendant on those terms, refused to indorse the bill of lading, and took it away, saying he considered the transaction at an end. The defendant did not object to Lethbridge taking the bill of lading. There had been a considerable rise in the market; and the same day Lethbridge went to the plaintiffs, who were corn-factors at Bristol, and indorsed the bill of lading to them, receiving the usual advances. Upon the Emerald arriving at Bristol the defendant went on board, and representing himself as the merchant owning the cargo, began to discharge it, and obtained 1,240 bushels of the barley, value 422*l.* 14*s.*, when the plaintiffs coming on board and presenting the bill of lading to the captain, the remainder was delivered to them, and they paid the freight.

The jury found that the defendant did not refuse to accept the cargo, and that he had made an unconditional tender of the price to Lethbridge; but they found that Lethbridge was not an agent intrusted with the bill of lading by the defendant. His Lordship thereupon directed a verdict for the plaintiff for 422*l.* 14*s.*, with leave to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him.

Crowder (Barstow and Greenwood with him) appeared to shew cause (Feb. 5), but the Court, after the reading of the Judge's notes of the trial, called on—

Butt and M. Smith, in support of the rule (Feb. 5 and 7).—The first question is, whether, having regard to the particular transaction and the terms of the original contract, it was not the intention of the parties that the property should pass by the delivery on board. The contract was for the sale of 500 quarters of barley, to be delivered free on board the ship of the vendee, and not of the vendor. As between the vendor and the vendee the transfer of the bill of lading was not necessary to pass the property. If the ship had gone down during the voyage the loss would have been the vendee's.

The vendee writes and instructs the vendor to select a vessel for him, and the delivery on board the Emerald was, in truth, a delivery on board a vessel which was hired for the vendee, and was at his risk. The case is the same as though Lethbridge were suing; for though generally it may be necessary that the bill of lading should be indorsed in order to pass the property, that is not the only mode in which as between vendor and vendee property passes. Payment is not a condition precedent to the passing of the property. In this case the property passed as much as if there had been an express contract that it should do so, but there was no bill of lading indorsed. Though the charter-party is in the name of the vendor, yet the vendee might be sued for the freight; for although the contract for freight was made by the vendor, yet as it was made by him for and as the agent of the vendee it is the same as if made by a third party employed by the vendee. The defendant wrote for information as to the vessel's port of loading that he might, as he expressly said, get the insurance done; so that it is clear the risk after delivery on board was to be the defendant's. Suppose he had had his own ship at the port of lading.

But, further, on the 8th of January the bill of lading and invoice were left at the defendant's counting-house, and the invoice was never taken away. Subsequently, after some dispute as to the quality of the barley, the money was tendered, and then Lethbridge took up the bill of lading and carried it away. This was a fraud, for there had been an appropriation of the cargo, an offer and acceptance, and the transfer was complete.

[PARKE, B.—The original contract might be satisfied by the delivery of any cargo answering to the samples. When then was the acceptance of the cargo complete? "Appropriation" may mean selection, or an agreement that the particular cargo shall be the thing transferred. If the terms of the contract are such as to shew that the parties intended that the property should pass by the mere agreement for sale, then by the law of England it passes, though by the Roman law it does not.]

If the property had not previously passed by the delivery on board, it vested by what took place at Bristol. The vendor there offered the cargo, which the vendee accepted.

[PARKE, B.—It is quite clear that the vendee reserves to himself the bill of lading; and the question is, for what purpose? Clearly to keep a lien on the cargo, and if so, when did the property pass?]

It passed as soon as the vendee agreed to take it. An unpaid vendor has a lien; but here there was a tender of the price, which was equivalent to payment, and the lien was at an end. Suppose Lethbridge had taken the money and not indorsed the bill of lading.

[PARKE, B.—The goods are put on board to be carried for Lethbridge, and not as the defendant's goods.]

[ALDERSON, B.—Is it clear that the defendant did accept the cargo without some condition as to the quality of the corn?]

[PARKE, B.—He must accept it as agreeing with the sample.]

The jury found there was no refusal to accept.

[ROLFE, B.—They did not find there was an unconditional acceptance.]

[PARKE, B.—As soon as Lethbridge said there was an end of the matter, it clearly could not pass.]

It had previously passed at Plymouth.

[ALDERSON, B.—Suppose Lethbridge had delivered on board wheat instead of barley, would the defendant have been bound to take it?]

Lethbridge never intended to keep the bill of lading. He says, I shall send you (the defendant) the bill of lading.

[PLATT, B.—When was the time when both parties agreed that that particular barley should be the subject of the contract?]

The case of Ogle v. Atkinson (1) is in point. There, A. being indebted to the plaintiff, accepted an order to purchase goods for him at R, and put them on board the plaintiff's vessel, sent for them, as the plaintiff's goods, advised him of the shipment for the plaintiff's risk and on his account, and remitted him the invoices. He procured the master to sign the bill of lading to the order of blank. It was held, that the property in the goods was changed by the delivery on board, and that a subsequent indorsement of the bill of lading to another party was inoperative. A conditional appropriation is not uncommon. Lethbridge here wrote, and said, I shall send you the bill of lading; and the subsequent taking and parting with it to another was in fraud of that contract. What passed between them in the defendant's counting-house amounted only to a discussion as to the quality, and the jury have negatived the idea of the defendant's having refused the cargo.

PARKE, B.—I am of opinion in this case, that the rule ought to be discharged. It is clear, the original contract between the parties was not for a specific chattel, but would be satisfied by the delivery of any 500 quarters of corn answering to what were agreed to be delivered. Therefore, by the original contract no property passed. That does not admit of the least doubt. Then, in order to deprive the original owner of the property, you must shew in this form of action (which is an action for the property, because the plaintiffs' claim is under the original contract) that at some subsequent period the property passed. It may be admitted, if a person orders goods, although they are to be selected by the vendor, and to be delivered to a common carrier and sent to the vendee, that as soon as the vendor has selected the goods and means to deliver them in performance of his contract, and delivers them to the carrier, the carrier becomes the agent of the vendee, and such a delivery of goods is a delivery by the vendor to the vendee; and if there is a binding contract between them, either by note in writing or by part payment, or subsequently by part acceptance, then there is no doubt that the property passes by the delivery to the carrier, provided the article agrees with the contract. Now, in this case it is said, the delivery on board ship is equivalent thereto, because the ship was engaged by Lethbridge as agent for the defendant. But assuming that were so, the actual delivery on board was not a delivery to the defendant, but a delivery to the captain to be carried under a bill of lading. Now, the bill of lading indicates for whom the master of the vessel is to carry the goods: he agrees thereby to carry them as agent for and on account of Lethbridge, and to deliver them to Lethbridge if he does not make an assignment of the bill of lading, and to deliver to the assignee of the bill of lading if it is afterwards assigned. Then the master continues in possession of the property, not as in the case of an ordinary common carrier, but as a person carrying on behalf of Lethbridge. Then you find by looking at the contract, that for some purpose or another (and there is no breach of duty or improper act on the part of Lethbridge) he stipulates that the price is to be paid on the delivery of the bill of lading, and the bill of lading is clearly contemplated by that contract to be a bill of lading by which Lethbridge is to preserve the controul over the property. I think it follows that the 500 quarters of corn being delivered to the captain to be carried for Lethbridge are not in the same situation that 500 quarters of corn delivered to a common carrier by order of the consignee would be; and, therefore, that the act of delivery did not pass the property in this case. Then what other subsequent act was there to pass the property; because it is admitted by the defendant's counsel that unless there was a subsequent appropriation of the 500 quarters the property did not pass? Now, the word "appropriation" may be understood in different senses. It may be understood to mean an election on the part of the vendor, where he has a right to choose the article which he will supply in performance of his contract; that may be called an appropriation, and the context will shew when the word is used in that sense; or it may mean that both parties have agreed that a particular thing shall be the article to be delivered in pursuance of the contract; and yet the property may not pass, as, for instance, in the case of an

May 26. } TIES RAILWAY COMPANY.

Arbitration—Corporation—Railway Company—Attorney, Authority to refer Cause.

An attorney appeared for a corporation in an action of debt, and consented to a Judge's order, referring "all claims made in the action" to an arbitrator. The arbitrator having awarded to the plaintiff a sum actually claimed in the action,—Held, that the question, whether that sum was a debt or not was submitted to the arbitrator, and that his decision on the point was final, even if erroneous.

Held, also, that an attorney authorized to appear for a party in a suit has incidentally authority to refer it without any fresh authority to that effect, and that the attorney having appeared for the corporation, to the knowledge of the directors, the corporation were bound by his acts as attorney, though he was not authorized to appear by an authority under seal.

In this case, the plaintiff had issued a writ in debt against the Eastern Counties Railway Company, who had appeared by an attorney. No further proceedings were taken in the action, but the attorney, who had appeared for the company, consented to a Judge's order, referring "the claims in that action" to an arbitrator. It appeared, by the affidavits, that the plaintiff sought to recover, before the arbitrator, sums between 3,000*l.* and 4,000*l.*, which, it was admitted, were debts, and a sum of 10,307*l.*, which the railway company contended, if recoverable at all, was to be recovered as unliquidated damages, and not as a debt; and consequently, as they contended, this was not included in the submission. The arbitrator made his award, directing the company to pay the plaintiff 14,410*l.* 7*s.* It appeared, by the affidavits, that the directors of the company were aware that the attorney had appeared for the company; but that he had no authority under seal to appear, and was not expressly authorized by the directors to refer the action.

In last term, a rule had been obtained, under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, calling on the company to shew cause why they should not pay to the plaintiff 14,410*l.* 7*s.*, the amount awarded to him.

Martin, Willes, and Prentice now shewed cause.—The Court in last term refused to set aside this award (1), but the company are desirous of raising the questions on the record; and the Court will not decide a question involving so large an amount in a summary manner, without appeal, but will rather put the plaintiff to bring his action.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The decision of this Court is an authority against you; but if, notwithstanding that, you can raise any doubt in any one member of the Court as to whether you may not plead with success a defence to an action on this award, we ought not to decide in this summary manner without an appeal.]

The reference in this case was solely of the action, which was in debt, and gave the arbitrator no authority to decide on anything which was not a debt. The decision of the arbitrator, though erroneous, is conclusive on all matters submitted to him, but he cannot enlarge his jurisdiction by an erroneous decision as to what his jurisdiction is. Suppose that an action of debt, and only an action of debt, being referred to him, he had adjudicated on an action for an assault, and had decided that that was a debt, could it be said that the parties were to be bound by such an award? The arbitrator is, in this respect, like an inferior court, which cannot give itself jurisdiction by its erroneous finding—Roberts v. Humby (2). On this principle the Court of Queen's Bench quashes convictions, when the Justices have acted without jurisdiction, though they have erroneously decided that they have jurisdiction, or grants a mandamus to compel them to entertain a complaint, though they have erroneously decided that they have no jurisdiction, yet the decision of a Justice on a matter within his jurisdiction is as conclusive as an award on matters within the submission.

[ALDERSON, B.—The arbitrator must, no doubt, come to a determination as to whether a matter is within the submission or

Prerogative — Revenue — Removal of Cause.

A vessel, having a quantity of fire arms on board, was seized by the officers of the Board of Customs, and after being detained for some time, was delivered up, unconditionally, to the owners. An action of trespass having been commenced in the Court of Common Pleas, for such seizure and detention, this Court made a rule absolute in the first instance, upon the application of the Attorney General, for the removal of the cause into this court.

This was an action of trespass, commenced in the Court of Common Pleas by the plaintiffs the registered owners of a vessel called the Black Cat, against the defendants, officers of the Board of Customs, for seizing and detaining that vessel. It appeared that the vessel was, on the 22nd of January 1847, cleared outwards at the Custom House in the usual way for Gibraltar, with a cargo consisting of a quantity of fire-arms and other military accoutrements. The vessel was seized by the Customs on the alleged ground, as the plaintiffs believed, that the exportation of this cargo was in contravention of the Foreign Enlistment Act, but after the vessel had been detained for some time, she was delivered up unconditionally, and proceeded on her voyage. Two months afterwards this action was commenced. Notice having been given by the solicitor to the Customs that counsel on behalf of the Crown and of the defendants would move this Court that the said action be removed out of the Court of Common Pleas into the office of pleas in this court,—

The Attorney General now moved accordingly.—He had no affidavit, but stated the facts as Attorney General.

Greenwood, for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted that the Court ought not to grant this application. In the first place, there ought to be an affidavit on the part of the defendants, from which the Court may see that the revenue of the Crown will be affected by this action. The course of authorities, almost without exception, shew that such an affidavit is necessary. In

Manning's Exchequer Practice, p. 194, it is laid down thus: "Where the state of the pleadings sufficiently discloses the question intended to be raised, no affidavit of a motion to remove the proceedings seems to be necessary. In other cases an affidavit is required from which it must appear that the matters in dispute relate to the revenue." The Attorney General v. Hallett (1) is the only case in which a motion of this nature was allowed to be made without affidavit, and there matter appeared on the face of the pleadings to shew that the Crown was interested. He cited In re Kingsman (2), The Attorney General v. Kingston (3), — v. — (4), Beningfield v. Stratford (5).

[PARKE, B.—The Court always give the Attorney General credit for stating the truth.]

[The Attorney General stated that he had an affidavit of the facts if the Court had thought it necessary that one should be used.]

Secondly, in point of fact the circumstances of the case are such that the revenue of the Crown cannot be affected; if it ever could have been so, it cannot now, for long before the present action was brought the vessel and cargo had been delivered up unconditionally to the plaintiff. In the note to Bereholt v. Cundy (6) it appears the Court refused to remove an action brought against an officer of the Customs for the seizure of a ship, where an information having been laid against the plaintiff, a verdict had been found for him, for the Crown had no longer any interest in the matter. He cited Bishop v. Warner (7), Cantborne v. Campbell (8), Beningfield v. Stratford.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I have no doubt at all about the matter. In my opinion, the cause should be removed into this court.

PARKE, B.—There is nothing in the facts of the case to shew that the vessel in question may not have been forfeitable at the entertained before him. Then was the time for them to apply to a Judge to revoke his authority, on the ground that he was exceeding his authority, if he really was doing so, which must depend on the construction of the submission, which gives him authority. Instead of doing so, they lie by, and take the chance of an award in their favour. The arbitrator has decided that this "claim" is a debt, and that was the very point submitted to him, on which, therefore, his decision is final. As to the other point it would be monstrous if parties suing a corporation were bound to seek for an authority under seal given to the attorney for each step. They would be grievously injured if that was the case.

ROLFE, B. concurred on both points.

PLATT, B.—I think that an attorney who has been duly authorized to appear for a litigant has incidentally authority to conduct the cause, and to refer it. If he does wrong he may be responsible to his client; but his client is bound. In the present case the attorney in fact appeared for the company; the company had notice that he had done so, and did not interfere, but suffered the proceedings to go on; and I think they are now estopped from denying that he was duly authorized to appear for them. As to the other point I concur.

Pleading—Trespass to Goods—Conversion—Matter of Aggravation.

A declaration in trespass to goods charged the defendant with taking and carrying them away, and also with converting them to his own use:—Held, that such conversion was merely matter of aggravation, and a plea to the whole declaration justifying the taking the goods and carrying them away, but omitting to justify their conversion, was a good plea.

Trespass. The declaration alleged that the defendants, on &c., with force and arms, &c., broke and entered a certain dwelling-house of the plaintiff, and then in the plaintiff's occupation, and then made a great noise and disturbance therein, and stayed and continued therein making such noise and disturbance for a long time, to wit, &c., and then forced and broke open, broke to pieces and damaged divers, to wit, two windows of the plaintiff, &c. of great value, &c., and also during the time aforesaid, &c., with force and arms seized and took divers goods and chattels of the plaintiff, to wit, &c., then found and being in the said dwelling-house, &c., and carried away the same, and converted and disposed thereof to their own use. By means of which several premises the plaintiff and his family were during all the time aforesaid not only greatly disturbed and annoyed in the peaceable possession of the said dwelling-house of the plaintiff, but the plaintiff was also during all that time hindered and prevented from carrying on and transacting therein his lawful and necessary affairs and business, &c.

The defendants pleaded, thirdly, to the whole declaration, that the said dwelling-house in which, &c., at the said time when, &c., was the dwelling-house, soil and freehold of one T. P, whereupon the defendants as the servants of the said T. P. and by his command broke and entered the said dwelling-house in which, &c., at the said time when, &c., and because the goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned, and every part thereof, at the said time when, &c., were and was in and upon the said dwelling-house in which, &c., incumbering the same, they, the defendants, as the servants of the said T. P. and by his command, in order to remove the said incumbrances, seized and took the said goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned, and then carried and conveyed the same away from and off the said dwelling-house in which, &c., to a small and convenient distance in that behalf, and there left the same for the plaintiff as they lawfully might for the cause aforesaid, which were the said alleged trespasses in the declaration mentioned. Verification.

Special demurrer, assigning for cause that the plea professed in the commencement thereof to be an answer to the whole declaration, yet that, although the declaration alleged that the defendants converted and disposed of the said goods and chattels to their own use, the said plea did not state or shew any answer to that part of the declaration.

Pigott, in support of the demurrer.—The plea affords no answer to that part of the declaration which charges the defendants with having converted the plaintiff's goods. The facts alleged in the plea only justify the seizing them and carrying them away; not the conversion.

[PLATT, B.—But is not the conversion mere matter of aggravation?]

In this declaration it is treated as a distinct act of trespass; and as the plea professes to answer all the trespasses alleged in the declaration, it should have in terms justified the conversion. The taking away a party's goods is not necessarily a conversion—Fouldes v. Willoughby (1).—He also cited Smith v. Edge (2), Oxley v. Watts (3), Gregory v. Hill (4), Woods v. Durrant (5), Davison v. Wilson (6).

Phipson, contra, was stopped by the Court.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all agreed that this plea is sufficient. The only trespasses in the declaration which required an answer were the breaking into the dwelling-house, and the taking and carrying away the plaintiff's goods. The conversion of the goods was merely matter of aggravation.

a copy of the marriage register was put in evidence, and a witness was called who stated that he was acquainted with one J. G., that he had inspected the original register, and that one of the signatures to it was in the handwriting of the J. G. whom he knew:—Held, that this was evidence of the identity of J. G., without the original register being produced.

This was an action by the drawer against the acceptor of a bill of exchange.

At the trial, before Parke, B., at the last Middlesex Sessions, the defendant's case was proved by putting in evidence an examined copy of the register of a marriage between the defendant and one Joseph Glossop, and by the evidence of a witness who knew a Joseph Glossop and his handwriting, and who having seen the original marriage register, swore that the signature to it was in the handwriting of the Joseph Glossop with whom he was acquainted, and who was then alive. The counsel for the defendant objected that the original register should have been produced, but the learned Judge overruled the objection, and the jury accordingly found a verdict for the defendant.

M'Mahon now moved for a new trial.—The original register ought to have been produced. The only mode by which the witness could speak to the fact of the defendant having married Joseph Glossop was by the signature to the original register. Without its production the jury could have no means of being satisfied of the accuracy of the witness's testimony.

On the trial of indictments for bigamy the original register is produced.

[PARKE, B.—I have tried, perhaps, more cases of bigamy than any other Judge, and I do not recollect one in which the original register was produced at the trial.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that this rule should be refused, upon the ground that the person who has the legal charge of the register cannot be called upon to produce it, and that in his absence it is for the jury to say what degree of weight and value they can give to the evidence of a witness who speaks to the handwriting of a document which is not before them. Suppose the question was, whether a certain person was at a particular place on a given day, and a witness was called, who said, "I know that person; he is the churchwarden of my parish, and on that day I saw a notice stuck on the church door, the signature to which was in his handwriting." That would be evidence, because the notice itself not being able to be removed could not be produced in court. Now if in point of law you cannot compel a party who has the custody of a document to produce it, there is the same reason for admitting other evidence of its contents as if its production were a physical impossibility.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion, and, using a similar illustration to that given by my Lord, will suppose that seditious or treasonable placards had been posted up, and a witness were to state that the handwriting of these placards was that of A. B.; that would clearly be evidence against A. B, upon the ground that the thing itself could not be produced. .

PLATT, B.—The only difficulty which arises in the case is this, that suppose the signature to the register to be a forgery, the plaintiff would have no means of shewing that to be so, unless the original register were produced. That is certainly some inconvenience; but, on the other hand, as the production of the document was not possible, I think the evidence given was admissible.

PARKE, B.—For the purpose of preserving parochial registers, the law allows parties to prove their contents by producing in evidence an examined copy, and dispenses with the production of the original register. Now, to prove the identity of a person, you may shew that in consequence of a particular mark, B, appearing upon the register, such a person was present at the time the entry in question was made upon it. In the present case a witness swore that he had seen the original register, and that one of the signatures to it was that of a James Glossop, whom he knew: that was evidence that this James Glossop was the person who then married the defendant. In all cases it is doubtful whether the party who has the custody of the register will produce it; and I take it to be quite clear that he is not bound to produce it under a subpœna duces tecum. But in any event its absence is only matter of observation to the jury as to the degree of weight to be attached to the evidence of a witness who speaks to a mark existing upon a document which is not before the jury.

Feb. 6. } CURLING v. WOOD.

Case — Duty — Wharfinger — Mooring Vessels.

A declaration in case for damage done to the plaintiff's vessel, stated that the defendant possessed a wharf on the Thames, near which there was a wood-work, placed there by the defendant, and being at the bottom of the river, and over which the after-mentioned ship at certain states of the tide would float, but not at other states of the tide; that the plaintiff was possessed of a ship then being by sufferance of the defendant at and alongside the wharf for reward to the defendant in that behalf; that the defendant had the management and controul of the wharf, and the mooring and stationing of ships at and near it whilst they were at the wharf for the purpose of using it. Breach, that the defendant unskilfully, &c. placed, moored and stationed the plaintiff's ship in the river, near the wharf and over the wood-work, and detained it there for a long and improper time, and until the ship, on the fall of the tide, struck against the wood-work, and thereby was greatly injured. Plea, that the defendant had not the management and controul of the wharf, and the mooring and stationing of ships, &c. modo et formâ.

On error, the judgment of the Court below was affirmed; and it was held, that the declaration sufficiently shewed a duty on the part of the defendant safely to moor and station the vessel, and a breach of it.

Error from the Court of Exchequer.

Case. The declaration stated that before and at the time when, &c. the defendant (the plaintiff in error) was possessed of a certain wharf for the loading and unloading of ships and vessels on the banks of the river Thames, near to which said wharf there then was certain wood-work before then by the defendant placed, and then being at and upon the bottom of the said river, over which said wood-work, at certain states of the tide of the said river, the ship or vessel hereinafter mentioned would float, but at other states of the said tide the said ship or vessel would not float, of all which premises the defendant before and at, &c. had notice; that at the time when, &c., and while the defendant was so possessed of the said wharf as aforesaid, the plaintiff was possessed of a certain ship or vessel of great value, to wit, &c., then being by sufferance and permission of the defendant at and alongside the said wharf for reward to the defendant in that behalf, and the defendant then had the management and controul of the said wharf, and the mooring and stationing of ships and vessels at and near the same, whilst such ships and vessels were at the said wharf for the purpose of using the same; yet the defendant, to wit, on &c., unskilfully, negligently and improperly placed, moored and stationed the said ship or vessel of the plaintiff in the part of the said river near the said wharf, and over the said wood-work, and unskilfully, negligently and improperly detained the said ship or vessel there over the said wood-work for a long and improper time, and until the said ship or vessel on the day and year aforesaid, upon the natural and usual fall of the tide in the said river, came, fell, and lodged upon and struck against the said wood-work at the bottom of the said river, and there remained and continued upon and striking against the said wood-work for a long time, to wit, &c., and thereby then became and was greatly strained, bilged, broken and injured, &c.

Third plea, denying that the defendant had the controul of the wharf, and of the mooring and stationing of vessels.

At the trial, before Platt, B., at the London Sittings after Easter term, 1846, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff on the third plea. A rule nisi for arresting the judgment having been refused by the Court of Exchequer (1), the defendant below brought a writ of error on the judgment.

Cleasby, for the plaintiff in error (the defendant below), Feb. 6th, 1848 (2).—The declaration which charges the wharfinger with unskilfully mooring a vessel at an improper place, discloses no duty for the breach of which he is responsible. The question is an important one; and it is quite a new thing to attempt to make a wharfinger liable for an accident which has happened to a ship in the river when moored at his wharf. There is a well-known distinction between docks and wharves. Ships in dock are in the custody and under the charge of the dock-owners; but ships moored at a wharf are not under the charge or custody of the wharfinger.

It is not stated that the defendant was employed to moor or station the ship, or that there was any reward to him for so doing; but that the vessel was alongside the wharf for reward to the defendant. This statement does not involve any duty on the part of the defendant to do any act relative to mooring. The object for which wharves are constructed is not the mooring of vessels. Wharfage is chargeable for laying goods upon the wharf — Stephen v. Coster (3).

very over of the ship into the care of the defendant.

[WILDE, C.J.—It appears that the plaintiff parted with his controul as to mooring the ship.]

It cannot be urged that by virtue of the defendant's employment as a wharfinger, the duty of mooring was cast upon him. It can only be argued, that the allegation as to the mooring implies an employment by the plaintiff of the defendant for the purpose of mooring.

[WILDE, C.J.—The declaration states, and the verdict finds, that the defendant had the management of the mooring and stationing. That excludes everybody else.

[ERLE, J.—And it implies an undertaking to use ordinary care in doing it.]

[WILLIAMS, J.—If we can give a construction to the allegation which will support the verdict, that construction must be given to it after verdict.]

The statement of negligence in the declaration is nothing of itself, unless the relation of the parties raised a duty binding on the defendant to use due care—Priestley v. Fowler (4).

Martin, for the defendant in error, was not called upon.

WILDE, C.J.—There is little doubt that the declaration is perfectly sufficient. What is it that is alleged as evidence of the claim for indemnity against the wrong which the plaintiff suffered? It is stated that the wharf was used for profit, that it was prepared in a certain manner, and that the vessel was alongside for reward to the defendant. It may be that wharfingers are not generally bound to moor ships. Different wharfingers may carry on their business in different manners. They may gain a profit from the mooring. The declaration here states that the defendant had the management and controul of the wharf and the mooring and stationing of vessels at or near it. What can be the meaning of having the stationing but controuling the place where the ship was to be placed? Then it is stated that the defendant unskilfully, negligently, and improperly placed and stationed the vessel in a part of the river near the wharf, and over the wood-work which had been placed there by the defendant; and then that he unskilfully, negligently, and improperly detained the vessel over the said wood-work for an improper time, till the vessel, upon the fall of the tide, lodged and struck upon it, and so was damaged. The effect of the whole statement in the declaration is, that the defendant, being proprietor of the wharf, the plaintiff came to use it for the profit of the defendant; that the defendant, who knew the condition of the wharf, placed the plaintiff's vessel where it was greatly injured. Is not that a state of things which creates the right to indemnity stated in the declaration? If such right is denied, the declaration might have been demurred to; but after the verdict how are we to construe it? Are we to look out for difficulties in the construction? It would be doing violence to language not to support the verdict. I think there is a good statement of such a relation between the parties as brought a responsibility on the defendant. The declaration states that he had the controul, and chose to place and station the vessel where it received an injury. I cannot see any just foundation for the doubt that wharfingers are not bound safely and securely to moor. That may be the case generally; but in this case the defendant chooses to moor for profit, and in doing so he unskilfully does that which causes the damage. I think, therefore, that he is responsible for that damage, and that the judgment of the Court below was correct.

Case. The declaration stated that before and at the time when, &c. the defendant (the plaintiff in error) was possessed of a certain wharf for the loading and unloading of ships and vessels on the banks of the Thames, near to which said wharf then was certain wood-work before the defendant placed, and then being upon the bottom of the said wharf which said wood-work, at certain tide of the said river, the hereinafter mentioned wood-work, so that other states of the said river the vessel would not float. Breach, that the defendants did not, nor would return the said acceptances, or pay to the plaintiff the said sum of 15*l.*

Demurrer, assigning for causes that no sufficient consideration was shewn for the defendants' promise; that the acceptances delivered to the defendant may have been worthless; that the declaration was defective in certainty in not stating the names of the parties whose acceptances were delivered to the defendant. Joinder therein.

J. Brown, in support of the demurrer.—The declaration is bad. First, there is no valid consideration for the defendants' promise. The consideration is not connected with the inducement; it does not appear whose "accounts" remained unsettled, nor whether the "debts" mentioned in the declaration were those of the plaintiff

Third plea, demurrer. The declaration had the contrary to the plaintiff's pleading, mooring and stationing the vessel.

instalments. Plea, that the defendants were ready and willing and endeavoured to sell the letters patent, but that no bonâ fide sale could be effected:—Held, that the defendants not having sold the letters patent were liable to pay the instalments.

Covenant. The declaration stated that
by indenture, dated the 1st of March 1836, made between the plaintiff of the first part,
G. W. of the second part, G. R. of the third part, and the defendants of the fourth part,
the parties of the first, second and third parts
bargained, sold, and assigned to the defendants certain letters patent; that the defendants covenanted with the plaintiff to pay to her 840*l.* by instalments as thereafter mentioned, that is to say, 120*l.*, the first instalment, on the 1st of April 1837, 60*l.* on the 1st of April 1838, and an instalment of 60*l.* yearly on the 1st of April in each year;
provided always, that if at the expiration of twelve months from the date of the said indenture the defendants should not approve of the working of the said patent and of such their disapprobation and of their intention to sell the same as thereafter mentioned they should give notice in writing to the plaintiff, such notice not to be given before the 1st of March 1837 or after the 31st of March 1837, then and in such case the payment of the first instalment should be suspended; and if having given such notice the defendant should within six months after the date thereof bonâ fide sell and dispose of the said letters patent to any person willing to purchase the same for the best price that could be reasonably obtained, and out of the produce of such sale pay the costs of such sale, and retain to themselves 246*l.* and pay over to the plaintiff the net surplus, if any, then and in such case the covenant and agreement for payment of 840*l.* should cease and determine. But if the defendants should neglect to give such notice, or having given such notice should neglect or refuse to observe all the other matters and things in the said proviso contained, then the covenant for payment of 840*l.* as aforesaid should be and stand in full force, and the said first instalment of 120*l.*, in case the same should have been suspended by the notice, should,

at the expiration of the six calendar months
from such notice, revive and be payable.
Averment, that the defendants gave due notice of their disapprobation of the said
letters patent and of their intention to sell the same; that six months from the date of the notice elapsed before the suit; and that the defendants had not bonâ fide sold the said letters patent or rendered the plaintiff an account of the sale, or of the costs, or of the net surplus. Breach, the non-payment by the defendants of any portion of the said
sum of 840*l.*

The defendants pleaded, lastly, that after the giving the notice in writing to the plaintiff of the defendants' disapprobation of the said
letters patent, and of their intention to sell the same, and within and during the period of the said six months after the expiration of the notice, the defendants were ready and willing, and endeavoured and offered bonâ fide to sell the said letters patent for the best price that could be reasonably obtained by public auction, but that no person would become the purchaser, and no bonâ fide sale could be effected; that during the said six months, and since, the defendants have been unable to sell the same; that the said letters patent have remained unsold without any default and against the will of the defendants;

On error, the judgment of the Court below was affirmed; and it was held, that the declaration sufficiently shewed a duty on the part of the defendant safely to moor and station the vessel, and a breach of it.

Error from the Court of Exchequer.

Case. The declaration stated that before and at the time when, &c. the defendant (the plaintiff in error) was possessed of a certain wharf for the loading and unloading of ships and vessels on the banks of the river Thames, near to which said wharf there then was certain wood-work before then by the defendant placed, and then being at and upon the bottom of the said river, over which said wood-work, at certain states of the tide of the said river, the ship or vessel hereinafter mentioned would float, but at other states of the said tide the said ship or vessel would not float, of all which premises the defendant before and at, &c. had notice; that at the time when, &c., and while the defendant was so possessed of the said wharf as aforesaid, the plaintiff was possessed of a certain ship or vessel of great value, to wit, &c., then being by sufferance and permission of the defendant at and alongside the said wharf for reward to the defendant in that behalf, and the defendant then had the management and controul of the said wharf, and the mooring and stationing of ships and vessels at and near the same, whilst such ships and vessels were at the said wharf for the purpose of using the same; yet the defendant, to wit, on &c., unskillfully, negligently and improperly placed, moored and stationed the said ship or vessel of the plaintiff in the part of the said river near the said wharf, and over the said wood-work, and unskillfully, negligently and improperly detained the said ship or vessel there over the said wood-work for a long and improper time, and until the said ship or vessel on the day and year aforesaid, upon the natural and usual fall of the tide in the said river, came, fell, and lodged upon and struck against the said wood-work at the bottom of the said river, and there remained and continued upon and striking against the said wood-work for a long time, to wit, &c., and thereby then became and was greatly strained, bilged, broken and injured, &c.

Third plea, denying that the defendant had the controul of the wharf, and of the mooring and stationing of vessels.

At the trial, before Platt, B., at the London Sittings after Easter term, 1846, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff on the third plea. A rule nisi for arresting the judgment having been refused by the Court of Exchequer (1), the defendant below brought a writ of error on the judgment.

Cleasby, for the plaintiff in error (the defendant below), Feb. 6th, 1848 (2).—The declaration which charges the wharfinger with unskillfully mooring a vessel at an improper place, discloses no duty for the breach of which he is responsible. The question is an important one; and it is quite a new thing to attempt to make a wharfinger liable for an accident which has happened to a ship in the river when moored at his wharf. There is a well-known distinction between docks and wharves. Ships in dock are in the custody and under the charge of the dock-owners; but ships moored at a wharf are not under the charge or custody of the wharfinger.

It is not stated that the defendant was employed to moor or station the ship, or that there was any reward to him for so doing; but that the vessel was alongside the wharf for reward to the defendant. This statement does not involve any duty on the part of the defendant to do any act relative to mooring. The object for which wharves are constructed is not the mooring of vessels. Wharfage is chargeable for laying goods upon the wharf — Stephen v. Coster (3).

very over of the ship into the care of the defendant.

[WILDE, C.J.—It appears that the plaintiff parted with his controul as to mooring the ship.]

It cannot be urged that by virtue of the defendant's employment as a wharfinger, the duty of mooring was cast upon him. It can only be argued, that the allegation as to the mooring implies an employment by the plaintiff of the defendant for the purpose of mooring.

[WILDE, C.J.—The declaration states, and the verdict finds, that the defendant had the management of the mooring and stationing. That excludes everybody else.

[ERLE, J.—And it implies an undertaking to use ordinary care in doing it.]

[WILLIAMS, J.—If we can give a construction to the allegation which will support the verdict, that construction must be given to it after verdict.]

The statement of negligence in the declaration is nothing of itself, unless the relation of the parties raised a duty binding on the defendant to use due care—Priestley v. Fowler (4).

Martin, for the defendant in error, was not called upon.

WILDE, C.J.—There is little doubt that the declaration is perfectly sufficient. What is it that is alleged as evidence of the claim for indemnity against the wrong which the plaintiff suffered? It is stated that the wharf was used for profit, that it was prepared in a certain manner, and that the vessel was alongside for reward to the defendant. It may be that wharfingers are not generally bound to moor ships. Different wharfingers may carry on their business in different manners. They may gain a profit from the mooring. The declaration here states that the defendant had the management and controul of the wharf and the mooring and stationing of vessels at or near it. What can be the meaning of having the stationing but controuling the place where the ship was to be placed? Then it is stated that the defendant unskillfully, negligently, and improperly placed and stationed the vessel in a part of the river near the wharf, and over the wood-work which had been placed there by the defendant; and then that he unskillfully, negligently, and improperly detained the vessel over the said wood-work for an improper time, till the vessel, upon the fall of the tide, lodged and struck upon it, and so was damaged. The effect of the whole statement in the declaration is, that the defendant, being proprietor of the wharf, the plaintiff came to use it for the profit of the defendant; that the defendant, who knew the condition of the wharf, placed the plaintiff's vessel where it was greatly injured. Is not that a state of things which creates the right to indemnity stated in the declaration? If such right is denied, the declaration might have been demurred to; but after the verdict how are we to construe it? Are we to look out for difficulties in the construction? It would be doing violence to language not to support the verdict. I think there is a good statement of such a relation between the parties as brought a responsibility on the defendant. The declaration states that he had the controul, and chose to place and station the vessel where it received an injury. I cannot see any just foundation for the doubt that wharfingers are not bound safely and securely to moor. That may be the case generally; but in this case the defendant chooses to moor for profit, and in doing so he unskillfully does that which causes the damage. I think, therefore, that he is responsible for that damage, and that the judgment of the Court below was correct.

Covenant. The declaration stated that
by indenture, dated the 1st of March 1836,
made between the plaintiff of the first part,
G. W. of the second part, G. R. of the third part, and the defendants of the fourth part,
the parties of the first, second and third parts
bargained, sold, and assigned to the defen-

mentioned, that is to say, 120*l.*, the first instalment, on the 1st of April 1837, 60*l.* on the 1st of April 1838, and an instalment of 60*l.* yearly on the 1st of April in each year;
provided always, that if at the expiration of twelve months from the date of the said
indenture the defendants should not approve of the working of the said patent and of such their disapprobation and of their intention to sell the same as thereafter mentioned they should give notice in writing to the plaintiff, such notice not to be given before the 1st of March 1837 or after the 31st of March 1837, then and in such case the payment of the first instalment should be suspended; and

if having given such notice the defendant
should within six months after the date thereof bond fide sell and dispose of the said
letters patent to any person willing to purchase the same for the best price that could be reasonably obtained, and out of the produce of such sale pay the costs of such sale, and retain to themselves 246*l.* and pay over to the plaintiff the net surplus, if any, then
and in such case the covenant and agreement for payment of 840*l.* should cease and determine. But if the defendants should neglect to give such notice, or having given such notice should neglect or refuse to observe all the other matters and things in
nant for payment of 840*l.* as aforesaid should be and stand in full force, and the said first instalment of 120*l.*, in case the same should have been suspended by the notice, should,
at the expiration of the six calendar months
from such notice, revive and be payable.
Averment, that the defendants gave due notice of their disapprobation of the said
letters patent and of their intention to sell the same; that six months from the date of the notice elapsed before the suit; and that the defendants had not bond fide sold the said letters patent or rendered the plaintiff an account of the sale, or of the costs, or of the net surplus. Breach, the non-payment
sum of 840*l.*

The defendants pleaded, lastly, that after the giving the notice in writing to the plaintiff
of the defendants' disapprobation of the said
letters patent, and of their intention to sell
the same, and within and during the period of the said six months after the expiration of the notice, the defendants were ready and willing, and endeavoured and offered bond fide to sell the said letters patent for the best price that could be reasonably obtained by public auction, but that no person would become the purchaser, and no bond fide sale could be effected; that during the said six months, and since, the defendants have been unable to sell the same; that the said letters
patent have remained unsold without any default and against the will of the defendants;

to the defendants three acceptances as follows:—16*l.* 6*s.* at two months, 21*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* at three months, and 26*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*, dated the 7th of April, at five months, as full settlement of debts, the defendants promised the plaintiff to return to him the acceptances drawn by the said defendant as follows:—28*l.* 15*s.* and 28*l.* Breach, that the defendants did not return the acceptances:—Held, on special demurrer, that the declaration was ill for want of certainty.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that the plaintiff had divers dealings with the defendant Crouch alone, and also with Crouch and the defendant Arrowsmith; that divers accounts remained unsettled between the plaintiff and the defendants; that the plaintiff had, for the accommodation of Crouch, accepted divers bills of exchange, and thereupon, to wit, on &c. in consideration that the plaintiff, at the defendants' request, then delivered to the defendants three acceptances as follows:—16*l.* 6*s.* at two months, 21*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* at three months, and 26*s.* 7*s.* 11*d.*, dated the 7th of April, at five months, as full settlement of debts, the defendants promised the plaintiff to return to him the acceptances drawn by the said Crouch, as follows:—28*l.* 15*s.* and 28*l.*, and to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 15*l.* towards a bill of exchange, drawn by the defendant Crouch, for 30*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*, which would become due on the 10th of May 1846. Breach, that the defendants did not, nor would return the said acceptances, or pay to the plaintiff the said sum of 15*l.*

Demurrer, assigning for causes that no sufficient consideration was shewn for the defendants' promise; that the acceptances delivered to the defendant may have been worthless; that the declaration was defective in certainty in not stating the names of the parties whose acceptances were delivered to the defendant. Joinder therein.

J. Brown, in support of the demurrer.—The declaration is bad. First, there is no valid consideration for the defendants' promise. The consideration is not connected with the inducement; it does not appear whose "accounts" remained unsettled, nor whether the "debts" mentioned in the declaration were those of the plaintiff or of third parties. Again, assuming the debts to be those of the plaintiff, sufficient facts are not stated to shew that the giving of the acceptances operated as a settlement of debts. It does not appear whether the bills of exchange equalled the debts, or whether the bills were negotiable. The authorities in support of this portion of the argument are Cumber v. Wane (1), Sibree v. Tripp (2), and James v. Williams (3). Secondly, the declaration is not sufficiently certain. It does not even state who are the acceptors of the bills. Appellans v. Blanche (4) shews that the omission of the christian names of persons mentioned in pleading, unless it be excused by averment, is bad on special demurrer. He cited, as to another point, Lynn v. Bruce (5) and Reeves v. Hearne (6).

Manning, Serj. contra.—The declaration is good. First, there is a valid consideration for the defendants' promise. Whatever may be the nature of the acceptances, the parties have treated them as a settlement of debts; and whether they be of any value or not the mere delivery of them to the defendants is an act of labour sufficient to support the declaration.

[ALDERSON, B.—Are the statements in the declaration made with convenient certainty? The plaintiff does not state whose debts they are. The plaintiff may amend, or judgment will be given against him.]

1848. } CHERRY v. HEMING AND AN-
June 9. } OTHER.

*A declaration stated that, by an indenture between the plaintiff and the defendants, the plaintiff sold certain letters patent to the defendants, and that the defendants covenanted to pay the price by instalments: provided, that if within twelve months from the date of the indenture the defendants should disapprove of the patent, and of their disapprobation and intention to sell it they should give notice to the plaintiff, the payment of the instalments should be suspended; and if the defendants should within six months after notice sell the said patent, and retaining to themselves 246l. pay over the surplus to the plaintiff, the covenant for payment of the entire sum should cease. But if the defendants having given such notice should neglect or refuse to observe all the other matters or things in the proviso, the covenant for payment of 840l. should stand. Averment, that the defendants gave due notice of their disapprobation and of their intention to sell, and that the defendants had not sold the letters patent. Breach, non-payment of the instalments. Plea, that the defendants were ready and willing and endeavoured to sell the letters patent, but that no bonâ fide sale could be effected:—Held, that the defendants not having sold the letters patent were liable to pay the instalments.*

should give notice in writing to the plaintiff, such notice not to be given before the 1st of March 1837 or after the 31st of March 1837, then and in such case the payment of the first instalment should be suspended; and if having given such notice the defendant should within six months after the date thereof bonâ fide sell and dispose of the said letters patent to any person willing to purchase the same for the best price that could be reasonably obtained, and out of the produce of such sale pay the costs of such sale, and retain to themselves 246l. and pay over to the plaintiff the net surplus, if any, then and in such case the covenant and agreement for payment of 840l. should cease and determine. But if the defendants should neglect to give such notice, or having given such notice should neglect or refuse to observe all the other matters and things in the said proviso contained, then the covenant for payment of 840l. as aforesaid should be and stand in full force, and the said first instalment of 120l., in case the same should have been suspended by the notice, should, at the expiration of the six calendar months from such notice, revive and be payable. Averment, that the defendants gave due notice of their disapprobation of the said letters patent and of their intention to sell the same; that six months from the date of the notice elapsed before the suit; and that the defendants had not bonâ fide sold the said letters patent or rendered the plaintiff an account of the sale, or of the costs, or of the net surplus. Breach, the non-payment by the defendants of any portion of the said sum of 840l.

The defendants pleaded, lastly, that after the giving the notice in writing to the plaintiff of the defendants' disapprobation of the said letters patent, and of their intention to sell the same, and within and during the period of the said six months after the expiration of the notice, the defendants were ready and willing, and endeavoured and offered bonâ fide to sell the said letters patent for the best price that could be reasonably obtained by public auction, but that no person would become the purchaser, and no bonâ fide sale could be effected; that during the said six months, and since, the defendants have been unable to sell the same; that the said letters patent have remained unsold without any default and against the will of the defendants;

was completed, the provision being that the parties may "issue execution against any person or persons who was or were a member or members of such corporation or co-partnership at the time the contract or contracts, or agreement or agreements on which such judgment, &c. were entered into." This is the common-law liability; but they do not confine it to persons who were partners at that time; for they go on and say, "or who became a member or members at any time before such contract was executed;" so that in the case of executory contracts these are liable who are partners at the time of the execution of the contract, and these also are liable at common law. Secondly, it makes those liable who became partners before the contract became an executed contract, and who are not liable at common law; and thirdly, those who were members "at the time of the judgment obtained," and these also are not liable at common law. It is, therefore, perfectly clear that this statute means to impose some additional liability beyond that which the common law imposed on the members of those copartnerships. I think there is no doubt that the object of the legislature was to accomplish a thing which it is very difficult to accomplish, namely, to treat these bodies as corporations, notwithstanding the fluctuating nature of their members; to make them liable to contracts, notwithstanding the change in their members; to make all the partnership property liable; and further to make each individual responsible for the debts of the partnership. The object of the legislature in allowing execution to be taken out against persons who were not liable as contracting parties, and also against those in the second degree, who were partners at the time of the judgment obtained, and not at the time of the contract, was upon the supposition that these persons had all the means of applying the funds of the society, and ought to have applied them, to the payment of the partnership debts. And probably they considered that persons who were actual members at the time the execution issued, and when the debt, therefore, ought to be paid, are the persons who, in the first instance, ought to be looked to, to take care that the partnership funds were applied to the payment of the debt; and that if they do not choose to apply them, or have not the means of applying them, they should be responsible in their own persons for its due payment. That seems to be the principle upon which the legislature acted,—a principle of some harshness towards those who were members at the time that the execution issued; but then there is no doubt, as the Attorney General has observed, that this act was framed upon the supposition that these companies would be always solvent, and would have funds to pay their debts with. If that is the right view, the effect is to make those who are partners, at the time the execution issues, liable; and then, in the event of an execution against them being unsuccessful, the remedy is to be taken against those who were partners at the time of the contract, then against those who were so at the time of the contract being completed; then against those who were so at the time of the judgment being obtained. It is to be observed that the legislature have let slip one class of persons, whether intentionally or not I do not know, namely, those who have become partners after the contract was completed, and have ceased to be so before judgment obtained, although they were parties at the time that the action was commenced: that case the legislature did not provide for, and they are certainly exempt, for there are no words to embrace them. My opinion, therefore, is, that in this instance, the plaintiff, by taking his remedy, by issuing writs of scire facias against the existing members of the company,—I mean those existing at the time the scire facias was obtained,—has pursued the proper course, and that he was not bound to take out any scire facias, and would have been wrong to have taken out any scire facias against those who were partners at the time that the action was commenced.

I come, therefore, to the last question, whether or no the plaintiff has entitled himself to this interference of the Court by the steps which he has taken against those different persons who were members at the time. Now the affidavits state, and there is a list annexed, that there are a great number of persons who were partners in this concern, against whom it would be, undoubtedly, hopeless to take any proceedings. Seven writs of scire facias have been issued, which promise a result of about 130*l.* altogether. But then it is said that there are two persons against whom no effectual steps have been taken in order to make them responsible, and against whom proceedings might be taken with effect. Against one scire facias issued; and it is objected that the present proceedings ought not to be allowed until that scire facias has come to its determination, and been finally disposed of. Now if I am satisfied that that scire facias would produce no result at all, or no result at all worth the expense of proceeding in it, then the pendency of such scire facias is no answer to this application; and I take it that is the principle of the case of Field v. McKenzie (15), in which Sir Thomas Wilde seems to have thought at first that you must issue a scire facias against every individual member, before you can apply to the Court for its interference against a person who was a member at the time of the contract made. That opinion was overruled by the rest of the Court, who thought it was enough if they were satisfied that every reasonable and proper effort had been made for the purpose of obtaining payment of the debt due to the creditors, by recourse to those who were primarily liable. That is the rule upon which I think I must act in the present case; and referring to the affidavits in the first place, with regard to the persons against whom the scire facias is pending, it appears to me that, looking to the affidavits on both sides, there appears to be no reasonable expectation of gaining anything from the scire facias. The defendant there, it appears, was the promoter, and was a trustee for a Scotch insurance office; and he accepted the shares as such trustee. I think it is impossible to make the partners in the Scotch Insurance Office liable, through his instrumentality, directly; but then it is said, that if he were to pay the amount, he would have his remedy in equity against the cestuis que trust; and suppose that that was not so, still if he was sued, and the scire facias was pursued to execution the probability is that the members of the Scotch company would not leave him to pay the debt, but would come forward upon a principle of honour, and discharge him. I think that is rather too remote a contingency for me to say that any good result can reasonably be expected to be produced from that scire facias, unless the defendant is himself a person in solvent circumstances. Now the affidavits on the part of the plaintiff shew that he is not a man likely to pay any reasonable portion, or indeed anything of the considerable debt which is in dispute in this action; while the affidavits on the other side, although they say he is apparently carrying on business, do not remove that impression from my mind. The same also may be said with regard to the other individual. He is a person said to be possessed of considerable property. The affidavits on the other side say that the property is greatly encumbered by mortgage beyond its real value; and that, therefore, any proceeding against him must be hopeless. I therefore think that in this case the plaintiff has satisfied what the majority of the Court of Common Pleas, and, ultimately, I believe my Lord Chief Justice Wilde, said was necessary in such a case, and which is a doctrine which I think was previously laid down in the Court of Queen's Bench—see Eardley v. Law (16), and Harvey v. Scott (17), that all that is requisite in this case is the reasonable certainty that the remedies against the existing members would be ineffectual. This the plaintiff has done; and I think, therefore, that this writ ought to go.

A testator devised as follows:—"I give to my wife N. all that house, shop, and garden now in the tenure of B, for her own sole use and purpose, and I also give to my wife N. all that messuage, farm, and premises now in the holding of C, to hold to her, my said wife, during the term of her natural life; and from and after her decease I give and devise the said messuage or tenement, and also the said farm and premises, given to my said wife for her life as aforesaid, to my son John. I give and bequeath to my son George the lease of the farm I rented of L, for his own use and benefit; and I also give to my son George that one acre of copyhold land I bought of G, and also half an acre of freehold land adjoining that one acre of copyhold land." After other devises the will contained the following passage:—"And I give and bequeath and order the rents or interests that is behind, due, and unpaid shall go and be paid to that person I have left the estates and properties respectively to. As to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my property whatsoever, and of what nature or kind soever, I give, devise, and bequeath the same to be equally divided between and amongst my said wife N. and her children who have issue, share and share alike."—Held, first, that the devise to George did not carry a fee in the devised lands; secondly, that the words "who have issue" meant who have when the will takes effect, and that the children of N, the wife, who had no issue at the death of the testator, did not take any interest under the residuary devise.

Ejectment to recover certain freehold and copyhold premises, in the parish of Hales Owen, in the county of Worcester.

The cause came on for trial, before Gaselee, Serj., at the Worcestershire Summer Assizes, 1847, when, by consent, the jury found the following special verdict:—

Aaron White, late of Hales Owen, in the county of Worcester, being seised in fee of certain freehold and copyhold premises, duly made and published his will, bearing date the 17th of July 1820; the material parts of which are as follows:—"I give to my wife Nanny White all that house, shop, and garden, now in the tenure of Benjamin Yates, for her own sole use and purpose; and I also give to my wife Nanny White all that messuage, farm, and premises, now in the holding of Mr. Chambers, situate at Cakemore, in that part of the parish of Hales Owen which lies in the county of Worcester, except the half acre of land now lying in Upper Quinton Field, and now in the holding of my son George White, to hold to her, my said wife, during the term of her natural life; and from and after her decease, I give and devise the said messuage or tenement, and also the said farm and premises given to my said wife for her life as aforesaid, to my son John White, subject to the payment out of the aforesaid premises of the sum of 50*l.*, to be paid to my son George White, and also the sum of 50*l.* to my daughter Sally Powers. I give and bequeath to my son George White the lease of the farm I rented of Lord Lyttleton, for his own use and benefit; and I also give to my son George White that one acre of copyhold land I bought of Counsellor Guest, lying and being in the uppermost Quinton Field, in the parish of Hales Owen; and also half an acre of freehold land adjoining that one acre of copyhold land, which I purchased of Martin & Horne, to my son George White; and also one more acre of copyhold land I bought of Counsellor Guest, lying and being in Horsenail Field, in the parish of Hales Owen, to George White, and now in his own occupation; and also those two half acres of land lying in Horsenail Field to my son George White; and also that leasow of arable land, called the Top Croft, containing four acres and a half, lying and being in Ridge Acre, in the parish of Hales Owen, to my son George White; and also those two dwelling-houses, shops, and gardens, now in the occupation of Benjamin Clay and Thomas Haycock, to my son George White; and also three plecks of land or gardens that I inclosed from the waste, and purchased of the surveyor of the highways, Mr. Richard Blocksedge, to my son George White; and also that house, shop, and garden, with the appurtenances thereto belonging, situate in Long Lane, in the parish of Hales Owen, and now in the occupation of Samuel Partridge, unto my son George White. . . . And I also give and bequeath to my daughter, Sally Powers, those two dwelling-houses, shops, and gardens, with the appurtenances thereto belonging, situate in the parish of Hales Owen, and county of Salop, and now in the tenure or occupation of J. Gould, to and for her own use, and to dispose of them as she may think proper amongst her children; and if she should die without disposing of the aforesaid property given to her, for it to go and be divided amongst her children, share and share alike. . . . I give and bequeath to my son John White, all that farm or estate I bought of Mr. Bradley, of London, containing about twenty acres, situate at the Quinton, in the parish of Hales Owen. . . . And I give and bequeath and order the rents or interests that is behind, due and unpaid, shall go and be paid to that person I have left the estates and properties respectively to. As to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my property whatsoever or of what nature or kind soever, I give, devise, and bequeath the same to be equally divided between and amongst my said wife Nanny White and her children, who have issues, share and share alike."

Aaron White died on the 23rd of May 1822, leaving Nanny White, his widow, and four children him surviving, all of whom were then married, that is to say, Sally, the wife of T. Powers; George White, the devisee in the said will mentioned; Lucy, the wife of W. Burton; and John White, one of the within-named defendants. All the children, except George White, had issue living at the time of the death of Aaron White. George White had issue between the death of Aaron White and the death of Nanny White, which issue are still living.

Nanny White made her will, duly signed and attested, dated the 30th of June 1826, and thereby gave and devised all her property that she might have or be entitled to at the time of her death, to her daughters, Sally Powers and Lucy Burton, to be equally divided between them, for their entire use and purpose, and to their heirs and assigns for ever.

Nanny White died in the month of January 1829, without altering or revoking her said will.

George White was, in the year 1830, duly admitted, according to the custom of the manor of Warley Wigan, to the said two acres of copyhold land devised to him by the will of Aaron White, to hold for all such estate and interest that he took therein under the said will, according to the custom of the manor.

George White, by his will, in writing, bearing date the 26th of June 1840, and duly signed and attested for the passing of freehold estates, gave and devised all his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever, unto his brother, the said John White, his heirs, executors, and administrators, upon certain trusts, for the benefit of his, the said George White's two daughters. George White died in the month of July 1840, without altering or revoking his said will.

Lucy Burton died intestate in the month of March 1837, leaving William Burton, the lessor of the plaintiff, her eldest son and heir-at-law, her surviving; and the said William Burton, the husband of the said Lucy, died in the month of September 1841.

After the death of George White, the defendant, John White, claimed to be entitled as devisee under the said will of the said George White, as tenant in fee simple, to the whole of the freehold and copyhold premises devised by the said will of Aaron White to the said George White, and procured the attornments to him of the several tenants in possession of the said premises, and has continued to receive the whole of the rents thereof, and has refused to account for or pay over any part of such rents to the lessor of the plaintiff, and the said John White came in and defended this action of ejectment as landlord, under the usual landlord's rule for that purpose.

The other defendants, except the said John White, were, at the commencement of this action, and still are, the several tenants in possession of the said freehold and copyhold premises devised to the said George White, which premises they severally held as tenants from year to year to the said George White in his lifetime, and after his death attorned and paid rent to the defendant John White, so claiming as aforesaid, and refused to pay rent to the lessor of the plaintiff, or to acknowledge him as landlord of any part of the said premises.

Upon the death of the said George White, the lessor of the plaintiff, William Burton, claimed as heir-at-law of his mother, Lucy Burton, to be entitled to one undivided fourth part, and also one undivided eighth part of and in the said freehold and copyhold lands and premises devised by the said will of Aaron White to the said George White, alleging that the said Lucy Burton was, at the time of her death, entitled to one undivided fourth part thereof, as tenant in common in fee, under the will of her father, Aaron White, and to one undivided eighth part thereof as tenant in common in fee under the will of her mother, the said Nanny White. (The special verdict then stated lease, entry, and ouster, and concluded in the usual form.)

In Michaelmas term (Nov. 10),

Phipson, on behalf of the lessor of the plaintiff, appeared to argue, but the Court called on

Hodgson (Whateley was with him), for the defendant.—First, George White took an estate in fee in the lands devised. Though the testator had devised to him certain freehold and copyhold lands without words of inheritance, yet the subsequent clause in the will giving the rents in arrear to the persons to whom he has left the “estates and properties,” must be read as part of the devise of the lands, and shew that the testator intended George should take an estate in fee. He referred to the following cases: Randall v. Tuchin (1), Wilkinson v. Chapman (2), Stewart v. Garnett (3), Goodwyn v. Goodwyn (4), Roe v. Bacon (5). The authorities are collected in Jarman on Wills, vol. 2. p. 181, and they clearly establish that the word “estate” will pass the fee, unless it is distinctly qualified by some previous words. When a testator says, “I have left the estates and properties” to a certain person, his intention is plainly that that person shall have them. In the devise to John the testator uses the word “estate.” The testator, instead of using the word “estate” in every devise, expresses the same thing by concluding his will with a declaration that the devisees shall have the unpaid rents, &c. of the estates and properties he has respectively given to them. The second question is, whether the children of the testator’s wife, who had no issue at his death, took any interest under the will. The residue is to be equally divided between his wife and “her children who have issue.” That may be construed without violence to the language to mean a gift to the wife and such children as shall have issue.

[PARKE, B.—If it had been a devise to “children,” those only would have taken who were living at the time of the testator’s death. The meaning is, who have children when the will takes effect.]

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by—

POLLOCK, C.B.—[His Lordship stated the special verdict, and continued:—]—There are two questions raised by this special verdict. The first, whether the devise to George White carried a fee in the devised lands. The second, whether, under the residuary devise, the children of Nanny White, who had no issue at the death of the deviser, took any interest. We are all satisfied upon both of these points, and decide them in favour of the lessor of the plaintiff. The first question depends upon the construction of the words “estates and properties,” in the part of the will in which they are used. The devise to George White of half an acre of freehold land, an acre of copyhold land, a leasow of arable land, &c., unquestionably passed an estate for life only to George White; but the learned counsel for the defendant contends that the operation of this devise is extended by the subsequent words, “I give and bequeath and order the rents or interests that is behind, due and unpaid, shall go and be paid to that person I have left the estates and properties respectively to.” It is contended that this clause is explanatory of the testator’s meaning, and shews that he intended all his interest in the devised land to pass.

It is established, by a long course of decisions, that the word “estate” or “estates,” used in the operative part of the will, passes not only the corpus of the property, but all the interest of the testator in it, unless controuled by the context; and that super-added words of local description, more applicable to the corpus of the property, indicating its situation or the nature of its occupation, do not prevent it from passing the whole interest; nor do words apparently explanatory of the meaning of the term inserted in the devise itself,—as where the testator leaves his real estate, that is, his land and buildings situate at A.—Denn v. Hood (6); or his freehold estate, consisting of thirty acres of land—Gardner v. Harding (7); or where the testator, after devising dwelling-houses to one for life (with a minute description), all which estates he devised after his death to another—Randell v. Tuchin. The Courts have extended the meaning of the word in order to effectuate what it may always be presumed that it was the intention of the testator to have done. But where the word “estates” is not used in the operative clause of the devise itself, but is introduced into another part of the will referring to it, we find no decision or dictum authorizing us to construe it as having the effect of extending the meaning of the operative clause, whether prior or subsequent; and to read the will as if the testator had said, “by the devise of lands in another clause, I mean to give all my estate in these lands.” This is the distinction pointed out by Gibbs, C.J., in the case just referred to of Randell v. Tuchin, where he says that the word “estate” is here used in the operative part of the devise, not introduced incidentally after the devising part is perfected, but introduced in the devise itself; and Heath, J. states the rule to be, that where the word “estate” is an operative word, it passes the fee. And it has been long settled, that where the word is used in a prior part of the will, as where the testator says, “as to all my estate, I devise the same as follows,” and then proceeds to devise lands, the use of the word “estate” will not enlarge the subsequent devises. It cannot be construed, in that case, as meaning a declaration by the testator that, by the subsequent devise of land, he meant to devise a fee; nor can it in this be held to amount to a statement by the testator that, by the prior devise, he intended that all his interest should pass. For these reasons, we are of opinion that a fee in the several lands devised did not pass to George White. As the devise itself did not carry a fee, the subsequent words, merely referring to it, and not being intended themselves to give any interest in the lands, do not. They are merely descriptive of persons to whom something else is given in a prior part of the will.

On the second question we have already given our opinion. The words, “who have issue,” must mean, who have when the will takes effect, that is, at the time of the testator’s death; and as a devise to her and her children would include only the children living at that time, the superadded description of having issue must be construed as applicable to those children who then have issue. Upon the latter point no stress was laid by the able counsel for the defendant.

Jan. 18. } LEE v. STONE AND OTHERS.

Will, Construction of—“Survivors or Survivor”—Estate in Possession.

Devise of three several estates to testator's three daughters, M, C, and L, for their respective lives, remainder to their children as tenants in common in fee, provided, “that if any or either of my said daughters shall depart this life without having lawful issue of her body or bodies, that then and in that case the property hereinbefore given to such daughter so dying shall go and accrue to the survivors or survivor of my said daughters, their heirs,” &c., “in equal shares and proportions as tenants in common; and if all my daughters, except one, should depart this life without having lawful issue, then that the share of such daughters so dying shall go to the survivor of my said daughter, her heirs and assigns for ever.” C. died on the 3rd of October 1841, leaving a son; and on the 25th L. died without having had issue. On the 22nd of December M. and her husband conveyed to a trustee the property devised to her for life, and also that devised to L, to hold to the use of M. for the joint lives of herself and her husband, with remainder to the survivor in fee:—Held, first, that the word “survivor,” in the will, must be read in its ordinary sense, and that upon the death of L. the estate devised to her for life vested absolutely in M. in fee. Secondly, that the son of C. could not, under any contingency, become entitled to any interest in the property devised to M. Thirdly, that under the will and conveyance the husband of M, in her right, had an estate in possession during the joint lives of himself and his wife.

The following case was stated for the opinion of this Court, by order of the first Vice Chancellor.

John Cook, late of West Bromwich, in the county of Stafford, cooper, deceased, was, at the respective times of making his will hereinafter mentioned, and of his decease, seised for an estate of inheritance in fee simple in possession of the three several properties in his said will respectively described, and thereby devised to his three daughters therein mentioned respectively, for their respective lives.

The said John Cook, on the 24th of February 1840, duly made and executed his said will, which was (so far as it is material to the present case) as follows:—

“I give and devise to my eldest daughter Mary Ann, the wife of Henry Stone, of West Bromwich, pawnbroker, all that my messuage, tenement, or dwelling-house, where I now reside, situate in High Street, in West Bromwich aforesaid, with the shop, yard, outbuildings, and premises thereto belonging, and also all that newly erected messuage, tenement, or dwelling-house, adjoining to the last-mentioned messuage, tenement, or dwelling-house, on the north-west side thereof, with the shop, garden, outbuildings, and premises behind the same and thereto belonging; to hold unto my said daughter Mary Ann Stone and her assigns, for and during the term of her natural life, to and for her own use and benefit, subject nevertheless to and charged and chargeable as hereinafter mentioned. And from and after the decease of my said daughter Mary Ann Stone, I give and devise the said two messuages, tenements, or dwelling-houses, shops, gardens, and premises, unto all and every the child and children lawfully begotten of my said daughter Mary Ann Stone, if more than one, to be equally divided between them share and share alike, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; and if there shall be but one such child, then to such only child, his or her heirs and assigns for ever. And I do hereby charge and make chargeable the property hereinbefore given to my said daughter, Mary Ann Stone, for life as aforesaid, with the payment of two several sums of 20*l.*, one of which sums I give and bequeath to my daughter Charlotte Angell, and the other I give and bequeath to my daughter Lucy Cook. And I give and devise unto my said daughter Charlotte Angell all those my three messuages, tenements, or dwelling-houses, situate in the High Street, in West Bromwich, aforesaid, adjoining to the south-east side of the messuage or dwelling-house where I now reside, together with the outbuildings, gardens, and premises thereto belonging, and also all those three other messuages, tenements, or dwelling-houses, adjoining the said last-mentioned messuages or dwelling-houses, situate in Water Street, in West Bromwich, aforesaid, together with the outbuildings, gardens, and premises thereto belonging; to hold unto my said daughter Charlotte Angell, and her assigns, for and during the term of her natural life, to and for her own use and benefit. And from and after the decease of my said daughter, Charlotte Angell, I give and devise the same messuages, tenements, or dwelling-houses, land, and premises, unto all and every the child or children of my said daughter Charlotte Angell lawfully begotten, if more than one, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; and if there should be but one such child, then to such only child, his or her heirs and assigns for ever. And I give and devise unto my daughter Lucy Cook all those my three messuages or dwelling-houses standing and being in the High Street, in West Bromwich aforesaid, at the north-west side of the messuages or dwelling-houses hereinbefore given to my said daughter Mary Ann Stone, with the gardens, outbuildings, and premises thereto belonging; to hold unto my said daughter Lucy Cook, and her assigns, for and during the term of her natural life, to and for her own use and benefit. And from and after the decease of my said daughter Lucy Cook, I give and devise the said messuages, tenements, or dwelling-houses, land, and premises, unto all and every child and children lawfully begotten of my said daughter Lucy Cook, if more than one, share and share alike, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, and if there shall be but one such child, then to such only child, his or her heirs and assigns for ever. Provided always, and it is my will, that if any or either of my said daughters shall depart this life without having lawful issue of her body or bodies, that then and in that case the property hereinbefore given to such daughter so dying shall go and accrue to the survivors or survivor of my said daughters, their or her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, in equal shares and proportions, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants. And if all my daughters, except one, should depart this life without having lawful issue, then I direct that the shares of such daughters so dying shall go to the survivor of my said daughters, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns for ever."

The said John Cook died on the 24th of January 1841, without having revoked or altered his said will, and leaving his said three daughters, (that is to say) Mary Ann, the wife of Henry Stone, Charlotte, the wife of John Angell, and Lucy, the wife of John Atkins, (in the said will called Lucy Cook,) his only children and co-heiresses-at-law.

The said Charlotte Angell died on the 3rd of October 1841, intestate, and leaving a son John Cook Angell, her only child and heir-at-law.

The said Lucy Atkins died on the 25th of October 1841, an infant under the age of twenty-one years, and without leaving or ever having had issue, and she left her sister, the said Mary Ann Stone, and her nephew, the said John Cook Angell, her co-heirs-at-law.

By an indenture of release, bearing date the 22nd of December 1841, and made and duly executed between and by the said Henry Stone and Mary Ann his wife of the one part, and John Dumbell, therein described, of the other part, (which said indenture was expressed to be made in pursuance of the act of parliament, passed in the 4th year of her present Majesty, and intituled 'An act for rendering a release as effectual for the conveyance of freehold estates as a lease and release between the same parties,' and was duly acknowledged by the said Mary Ann Stone, as by law required for rendering effectual conveyances by married women), all the said property by the said will of the said testator, John Cook, devised to the said Mary Ann Stone for life, and also all the said property by the said will devised to the said Lucy Atkins for life, together with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging respectively, and all the estates, right, title, interest, property, claim, and demand whatsoever of them the said Henry Stone and Mary Ann his wife, and of each of them, into and out of the same premises, were (inter alia), in consideration of the sum of 10s. to the said Henry Stone and Mary Ann his wife paid by the said John Dumbell, duly conveyed by the said Henry Stone and Mary Ann his wife unto the said John Dumbell and his heirs, to have and to hold the same unto the said John Dumbell and his heirs; nevertheless to the use of the said Mary Ann Stone and her assigns, for and during the joint natural lives of them the said Henry Stone and Mary Ann his wife, without impeachment of waste, and her receipts alone for the rents and profits to be from time to time good discharges. And from and immediately after the decease of either of them, the said Henry Stone and Mary Ann his wife, to the use of the survivor of them, the said Henry Stone and Mary Ann his wife, his or her heirs and assigns for ever.

The said Henry Stone and Mary Ann his wife, and John Cook Angell are all now living, and the said Mary Ann Stone has not and has never had any issue.

The questions for the opinion of the Court are, first, whether the said Mary Ann Stone, or the said Henry Stone, and Mary Ann Stone his wife, in her right, has or have any and what estate in possession in the property by the said will devised to the said Lucy Atkins for life. Secondly, whether the said John Cook Angell has any and what estate in possession in the property by the said will devised to the said Lucy Atkins for life. Thirdly, whether, contingently or otherwise, the said John Cook Angell has any and what estate in reversion, remainder, or expectancy in the property by the said will devised to the said Lucy Atkins for life. Fourthly, whether the said Mary Ann Stone, or the said Henry Stone, and Mary Ann his wife, in her right, has or have any and what estate in possession in the property by the said will devised to the said Mary Ann Stone for life. Fifthly, whether, contingently or otherwise, the said John Cook Angell has any and what estate in reversion, remainder, or expectancy in the property by the said will devised to the said Mary Ann Stone for life.

The case was argued, in Michaelmas term, by—

Rose, for Mary Ann Stone and Henry Stone.—With respect to the property devised to Lucy Atkins he contended that upon her death, Mary Ann Stone took an estate in fee simple in the whole, and that John Cook Angell took no interest whatever. That there was nothing in the will to shew that the testator used the word "survivor" in any other than its ordinary sense; and therefore, like every other term unexplained by the context, it must be interpreted according to its literal meaning—2 Jarman on Wills, 609, Ferguson v. Dunbar (1), Crowder v. Stone (2), Davidson v. Dallas (3), Wilmot v. Wilmot (4), Milsom v. Audry (5), and Leeming v. Sherratt (6). If the word "heirs" receives its natural meaning there can be no tenancy in common between Mary Ann Stone and John Cook Angell. Had the first daughter died without issue the survivors would have taken an estate in fee simple, as tenants in common; and the intention of the testator was, that the latter part of the proviso should operate by way of executory devise of the accruing share in the event of the second daughter dying without issue. With respect to Mary Ann Stone she had an estate for life in the share originally devised to her; and, upon the death of Lucy Atkins without issue, she took a moiety of the inheritance as co-heir of the testator with John Cook Angell. Each of the daughters has an estate for life, with remainder in fee to her children, and each child when born would take a vested interest—Doe v. Perryn (7), Right v. Creber (8),

Doe v. Hopkinson (9); but until that contingency happened, the inheritance descended to the testator's heir-at-law. The effect of the conveyance was to merge the life estate in the reversion, and to destroy the contingent remainder—Fearne on Contingent Remainders, 339, Mansell v. Mansell (10), and Purefoy v. Rogers (11).

Winser, for John Cook Angell.—In order to carry out the testator's intention, the words "survivors or survivor" must be construed to mean "others or other;" and if so, the word "survivor" in the latter branch of the proviso must receive the same construction. The testator uses the word "property" in the former part of the proviso, but in the latter part of it he uses the word "share," which was intended to apply to the share that accrued to the survivors on the death of the first daughter, and is by no means identical with the word "property." Unless the word "survivor" be so construed there would be an intestacy as to this property on the death of Mary Ann Stone without children. In those cases in which the word "survivor" has been construed according to its ordinary meaning the context and general intention of the testator as expressed on the face of the will have required it. Here they require the words "survivors or survivor" to be read as meaning "others or other." He then referred to Lord Abinger's judgment in Toldrey v. Colt (12), Harman v. Dickinson (13), Doe v. Wainwright (14), Leake v. Robinson (15), and Aiton v. Brooks (16). As to the effect of the deed of the 22nd of December 1841, there could be no merger. It would only operate to defeat the contingent remainders, and would have no effect on the executory devise—Cruise's Digest, tit. 'Merger.'

Rose replied.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The question in this case is, whether the words "survivors or survivor," occurring in the will of John

Cook, are to be construed according to their natural import, or as meaning "other or others."

The testator had three daughters, Mary Ann, the wife of Henry Stone, Charlotte, the wife of John Angell, and Lucy, afterwards the wife of John Atkins, but who, at the date of the will, was unmarried.

By the will in question, the testator gave a real estate to his daughter Mary Ann, for her life, with remainder to her children as tenants in common in fee, and he gave another real estate to each of his two other daughters, Charlotte and Lucy, for their respective lives, with like remainder to their respective children in fee. Then follows this proviso:—"Provided always, and it is my will, that if any or either of my said daughters shall depart this life without having lawful issue of her body or bodies, that then, and in that case, the property hereinbefore given to such daughter so dying, shall go and accrue to the survivors or survivor of my said daughters, their or her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, in equal shares and proportions, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants. And if all my daughters except one should depart this life without having lawful issue, then I direct that the shares of such daughters so dying shall go to the survivor of my said daughters, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, for ever."

The testator died in January 1841. On the 3rd of October following Charlotte Angell died intestate, leaving a son, John Cook Angell, her only child and heir. And on the 25th of the same month of October 1841, Lucy Atkins died an infant, never having had any child.

The case states, that on the 22nd of December 1841, Stone and his wife conveyed to John Dumbell and his heirs, as well the property devised to Mary Ann Stone for life, as also that devised to Lucy Atkins for life, to hold the same to Dumbell and his heirs, to the use of Mary Ann Stone, for the joint lives of herself and her husband, with remainder to the survivor of them in fee.

The question is whether, on the death of Lucy, Mary Ann Stone, as the then sole surviving daughter of the testator, took the whole of the estate originally devised to Lucy, or whether John Cook Angell, as heir-at-law of Charlotte his mother, took one moiety of it. And this depends upon the construction to be put upon the word "survivor," as occurring in the proviso. If it is to be construed according to its natural meaning, certainly Mary Ann is entitled to the whole, for she alone survived Lucy: if it means "other," then John Cook Angell, as heir-at-law of his mother Charlotte, is entitled to one moiety.

We are of opinion that in this case there is nothing to justify us in giving to the word "survivor" any other than its natural meaning. Even admitting that there are cases in which the Courts have taken upon themselves to say that by the words "survivors or survivor" the testator must have meant "others or other," though there has been nothing to warrant such a construction beyond the strong probability that the testator may so have intended, yet it is also certain that the almost uniform current of authority on this subject for above half a century has run in an opposite direction; and this on very sound and reasonable principles. It may be, that by a rigid adherence to the ordinary meaning of the testator's words, the Courts may sometimes disappoint the intention which he really had, and which, by the words in question, he meant to express; but this is a misfortune against which it is impossible to guard: it arises, not from any defect of the law, but from the neglect of the testator in not using language calculated to express his real meaning. The law admits of no will except a will reduced into writing, and signed by the testator; and we are violating the law whenever we receive as a testator's will, not what he has written, but what we conjecture he meant to have written. Of course, this observation does not apply to a case where, on the face of the will, it appears that any word of known import is used in some other than its definite sense, differing from its ordinary sense. We are bound, then, to give such word the sense in which it has been used, in the same way as if the testator had in terms said he intended so to use it. It is impossible to lay down any general rule beforehand, defining what will in each case be sufficient to enable a Court to say, from matter apparent on the face of the will, that the testator is using any word not according to its ordinary meaning. It is sufficient for us to say, that there must be something beyond the mere probability, however strong, that the testator was not aware of the precise effect of the language he has used. In this case there is nothing to shew to us that the word "survivor" was used in any other than its ordinary sense, and therefore we must give to it its ordinary meaning, and hold that the property given to Lucy for her life, on her death vested absolutely in Mary Ann in fee.

On the same principle precisely, we must hold that under no possible contingency can John Cook Angell become entitled to any interest in the property given to Mary Ann Stone for her life. By the fourth question put to us we are requested to state whether Stone and his wife, or either of them, have now any and what estate in possession in the property devised to Mrs. Stone for her life. On this part of the case some arguments were addressed to the Court as to what was the effect of the deed of the 22nd of December 1841 on the contingent remainders in fee expectant on the life estate given to Mrs. Stone; but the question proposed to us is only as to whether Mr. and Mrs. Stone have now any and what estate in possession in this property, and it is perfectly clear, under the operation of the will and deed, that Mr. Stone, in right of his wife, has an estate in possession during the joint lives of himself and his wife. On these principles, we shall certify our opinion to the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce.

Sheriff's Bailiff—Attorney and Client—Liability for Fees.

Where a sheriff's bailiff is employed by an attorney to issue a writ of execution against a defendant, the attorney and not the client is liable to the bailiff for his fees.

Assumpsit by the plaintiff, as bailiff of the sheriff of Cambridgehire, for work and labour in executing a certain writ and keeping a certain person, arrested by the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, under the said writ.

Plea—Non assumpsit.

At the trial, before Platt, B., at the Westminster Sittings, in Michaelmas term last, the following facts appeared:—The plaintiff was a bailiff of the sheriff of Cambridgehire, and the defendant a farmer residing in the same county; and the action was brought to recover the sum of 3*l.* 3*s.* for arresting and carrying to Cambridge gaol a person named Payne, against whom the defendant had obtained a judgment, and who had been arrested by the plaintiff. The defendant having a claim against Payne on a promissory note, instructed his attorney, Mr. Wilkin, to proceed against him for the recovery thereof. The action was afterwards brought in the name of Mr. Wilkin's agent in London, and judgment obtained against Payne. The defendant having subsequently instructed Mr. Wilkin to sue out execution against the defendant, the London agent issued a ca. sa., and sent it to the under-sheriff's office, with instructions that the warrant should be delivered to the plaintiff, the sheriff's bailiff. Under these circumstances, it was contended, on behalf of the defendant, that the plaintiff must be nonsuited, on the ground that the action ought to have been brought against the attorney, and not against the client, the defendant. The learned Judge refused to nonsuit, and the jury, under his direction, found a verdict for the plaintiff; leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

O'Malley having obtained a rule nisi accordingly,—

Huddleston shewed cause (May 30).—The sheriff's officer was at liberty to bring an action for his fees against the client, the present defendant, and was not bound to proceed against the attorney. The case resembles that of a witness, where it has been held that the attorney in the cause is not liable to a witness whom he subpoenas to give evidence—Robins v. Bridge (1). The attorney is merely the agent.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Is the attorney to burden his client with every separate contract that he, the attorney, may make?]

Magbery v. Mansfield (2) decides that the attorney of the execution plaintiff is not liable to the sheriff for the fees due on the execution of a writ of ca. sa. The attorney is an agent acting with a disclosed principal. In Hartop v. Jukes (3) it was held that the solicitor under a commission of bankruptcy is not liable, in the first instance, to the messenger whom he nominates, for his bill of fees. The bailiff executes the writ in the name of the principal, who is mentioned in the writ. In Newton v. Chambers (4) it was held that a sheriff's officer might maintain an action against the attorney of the plaintiff for fees, on proof of an employment by the attorney, and of its being usual for the attorney to be charged with such fees. In Maybery v. Mansfield Erle, J. said, "The law is, that the client is liable in such a case as this."

[POLLOCK, C.B.—In that case Robins v. Bridge was not cited.]

In Seal v. Hudson (5) Coleridge, J. seems to be of opinion that in a case like the present the attorney is not liable. Foster v. Blakelock (6) decides, indeed, that a bailiff, employed by an attorney to execute writs, may maintain an action against him for the usual fees; but that case, as well as Walbank v. Quarterman (7), is distinguishable from the present, on the ground that there the bailiff was decidedly employed by the attorney.

[ALDERSON, B.—Is the attorney entitled to pledge the credit of the client for those liabilities which are usually paid by the attorney?]

Hart v. White (8) decides that the petitioning creditor, and not the solicitor, is liable to the messenger under a commission of bankruptcy for the costs and expenses attending it.

[ALDERSON, B.—The dictum of Erle, J. was not necessary for the determination of the case, and is in the teeth of a written judgment.]

The Court intimated that they would consider the question, and also whether it would be necessary to hear Mr. O'Malley, in support of the rule.

O'Malley was not called on to support his rule; and—

ROLFE, B. now said—In this case, which was argued before us on the 30th of May last, we think the rule must be absolute to enter a nonsuit. The action is brought by the plaintiff, a bailiff of the sheriff of Cambridgeshire, against the defendant, to recover the sum of 3*l.* 3*s.*, for the plaintiff's trouble in executing a writ of ca. sa. issued against a third party, at the suit of the defendant and at his request. The defendant has pleaded non assumpsit. It was objected at the trial, that the defendant was not liable, but that the defendant's attorney was the party who ought to have been sued, and upon this ground a rule was obtained to enter a nonsuit. The case was argued before us, by Mr. Huddleston, on the part of the plaintiff, Mr. O'Malley appearing for the defendant, and the Court took time to consider their judgment. The case of Foster v. Blakelock decides that a sheriff's officer who has been employed by an attorney to execute writs for him, may maintain an action against the attorney for the fees usually paid on such occasions. Walbank v. Quarterman is expressly in point. That case decided that an attorney who employs a sheriff's bailiff is liable to him for his fees, and that the client is not liable, there being no privity between him and the officer. The plaintiff, on the other hand, relied upon the case of Maybery v. Mansfield. That decision, however, is not at variance with Walbank v. Quarterman, for in the former case the action was by the sheriff, whose right of action depends upon statutes and not upon contract. The plaintiff also relied upon Seal v. Hudson in the Bail Court, where my Brother Coleridge appears to have held, that the sheriff's officer could sue the attorney except under special circumstances. It does not, however, appear that the learned Judge's attention was called to all the cases on the subject. If, however, Seal v. Hudson is to be considered at variance with Foster v. Blakelock and Walbank v. Quarterman, and this Court

A, by indenture, covenanted with B. & C, their executors, administrators, and assigns, to pay a sum of money, to be held by them on certain trusts. C. did not assent to or execute the deed, and subsequently by an indenture, to which neither A. nor B. were parties, disclaimed all the trusts of the first indenture:—Held, that B. could not alone sue A. upon the covenant during the lifetime of C.

Error from the Court of Exchequer.

Covenant. The declaration stated an indenture of settlement, bearing date the 30th of December 1842, and made between John M. Cooke and Mary Eliza his wife, of the first part; the plaintiff in error (the defendant below) of the second part; and the defendant in error (the plaintiff below) and Charles Lord Glenelg of the third part, whereby it was witnessed for the considerations therein mentioned that the defendant below, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenanted with the plaintiff below and Lord Glenelg, their executors, administrators, and assigns, to pay them 15,325*l.* by certain instalments, to be held by them upon the trusts therein mentioned; and that in default of payment of the said sum or any instalment thereof, it should be lawful for the plaintiff below and Lord Glenelg to issue execution on a warrant of attorney given by the defendant below, to suffer judgment at the suit of the said plaintiff below and Lord Glenelg. The declaration then set out another indenture, dated the 9th of December 1843, and made between the said J. M. Cooke of the first part, the plaintiff below of the second part, and John Evans of the third part, whereby the said J. Evans was substituted as a trustee of the settlement in the room of the plaintiff below. It then averred that Lord Glenelg never executed or assented to or ratified the first-mentioned indenture, and that on the 28th of March 1844, by an indenture then made between the said Lord Glenelg of the one part, and the said John Evans of the other part, the said Lord Glenelg disclaimed the trusts of the said first-mentioned indenture, of which the defendant below had notice. Breach, that the defendant below had refused to pay certain instalments which became due under the said covenant.

To this declaration there was a special demurrer, on the ground that it did not disclose any right in the plaintiff below to maintain an action alone against the defendant below for breach of the covenant mentioned in the declaration, and that Lord Glenelg ought to have been joined as a co-plaintiff. The defendant below joined in demurrer, and judgment was given by the Court of Exchequer (without argument) for the plaintiff below. Upon this judgment a writ of error was brought, which was argued (1) after Michaelmas term, 1846, by—

Watson, for the plaintiff in error.—This covenant being entered into with the defendant in error and Lord Glenelg, as joint covenantees, an action by one during the life of the other cannot be maintained. The non-assent and disclaimer of Lord Glenelg cannot affect the prior covenant of the plaintiff in error, who has agreed to pay money to the two trustees, and not to one of them only. The confidence was reposed in the two, and cannot be claimed by one only. The argument on the other side treats it as a covenant with two, or with one in case the other dissents. As to any reasoning founded on the hardship which would arise if Langston cannot sue alone, as Lord Glenelg may refuse to lend his name to a joint action, the answer is, that being a trustee, equity will compel him to join if necessary for justice. The same reasoning would apply to every case where one of several joint covenantees has given a release. This action is entirely novel, no instance being to be found in the books of one of two joint covenantees suing alone during the life of the other. Both may sue jointly, though one did not seal the deed—Clement v. Henley (2), Vernon v. Jefferys (3). In Petrie v. Bury (4), it was held that all must sue, though some did not seal. It is true that the effect of a disclaimer or express refusal to assent to the covenant was not decided on in that case. Abbott, C. J. expressly alludes to such a state of circumstances, and adds, "trustees may often assent to a trust without executing the deed which creates it, and they may assent at any time, and without an express allegation of dissent that will not appear." Bayley, J. then says, "it appears on the face of the deed to have been his (the covenantor's) intention that the money should go into the hands of the three, and that there should be the security of them all for the due application of the money. It is a general rule, confirmed by the late case of Scott v. Godwin (5), that all joint covenantees or obligees must sue." This point came incidentally into discussion in Foley v. Addenbrooke (6). This is by no means analogous to a disclaimer of an estate which a party may refuse to accept if he pleases. The doctrine as to this is laid down in Sheppard's Touchstone, p. 284; Butler and Baker's case (7), Townson v. Tickell (8); but the case is different with a contract, which cannot be disclaimed without defeating the joint contract altogether. Then the question is not altered by the fact of there being the deed of disclaimer by Lord Glenelg. That deed does not affect the original covenant, as the parties to the contract were not parties to the deed. Therefore it cannot at all affect the right of Lord Glenelg to come in and sue at any subsequent time. If judgment were entered up on the warrant of attorney given by the defendant below, it must be entered, and execution issued in the name of Lord Glenelg as well as his co-covenantees.

plaintiff in error is, that Lord Glenelg may still come in and sue on the covenant, but he is estopped by this deed from doing so. This case falls within the class of estoppels in pais, stated in 1 Instit. 352, a. In Lyon v. Reed (9), Parke, B. said, "The acts in pais, which bind parties by way of estoppel, are but few, and are pointed out by Lord Coke—Co. Litt. 352, a. They are all acts which anciently really were, and in contemplation of law have always continued to be, acts of notoriety, not less formal and solemn than the execution of a deed, such as livery, entry, acceptance of an estate, and the like." Here there is actually the solemnity of a deed.

[COLERIDGE, J.—Is there any case where a person, not a party to the deed, has taken advantage of the estoppel?]

There may be an estoppel by a deed-poll against the party executing. In Whelpdale's case (10) it is laid down, "if a bond be delivered to another to the use of the obligee, and it is tendered to him and he refuses it, then the delivery has lost its force, and the obligee can never after agree to it, and therefore the obligor may say it is not his deed." In Cooch v. Goodman (11), the question, whether all the parties to a deed must join, was considered, but the case was ultimately decided on another ground. It is said that a disclaimer of an estate differs from this case. That is so; but the difference is in favour of a contract being capable of disclaimer. An estate vests at once on the execution of the instrument creating it, whereas a contract, being an act of the will in both parties, cannot exist if one of the parties dissents from it: "no estate can be made to a man of anything in fee simple, for life or otherwise, against his will; and therefore, by his disagreement or refusal of it, the estate itself, and the deed whereby it is conveyed, may become void"—Sheppard's Touch. p. 288. *The London and Brighton Railway Company v. v. Thornton (14), Archard v. Coulsting (15), were also cited. Begbie v. Crook (16) is a direct authority in favour of the plaintiff below. In Bonifant v. Greenfield (17), it was thought that if land was devised to several, and one refused, the rest might sell—Bro. Abr. 'Devise,' pl. 31, there cited. Townson v. Tickell was the case of two devisees, one of whom dissented, and it was held that the other might sue alone. But the case of a contract is said by the other side to rest on different principles from an estate which a party cannot be forced to accept of against his will. No doubt the contract of the defendant below was entered into with two; but the question is, whether the disclaimer by one of these two has not relation back to the time when the contract was made, and does not shew that the dissenting party never in truth entered into such a contract at all. If so, it is void as to him, but stands good as to the other contractor. Suppose Lord Glenelg had died the day before the execution of the settlement, but without the knowledge of the covenantor, there is no doubt that the covenant would still be good as to Langston; on the same principle as if the co-covenantee were an alien enemy, the other could sue alone. So, if the co-covenantee were a monk, who is civiliter mortuus—Sheppard's Touchstone, 71.

[WILDE, C.J.—That is what the other side say: the covenant is gone.]

The effect is to make it as if there never had been a covenant with Lord Glenelg—

Thetford v. Thetford (24); but it still enures as a good covenant with Langston. Until the assent of all the persons who take, the deed is inoperative—Matson v. Booth (25). It is analogous to bills of exchange which are altered before acceptance—Kearney v. Nash (26), Jones v. Jones (27).

[COLERIDGE, J.—Do you say that without any disclaimer the deed would be imperfect till Lord Glenelg had assented?]

Probably in the absence of anything to the contrary, assent would be presumed. It is said in Butler and Baker's case, "if a man makes a gift in tail to husband and wife, and afterwards grants the reversion of the lands and tenements which the husband and wife held in tail, and afterwards the husband die, and the wife, to have her dower, waives and disagrees to the estate tail; now as to her there is a nullity of the estate ab initio; and to such intent the law feigns that the estate was made only to the husband." In Petrie v. Bury it is only said one joint covenantee cannot sue alone without shewing some excuse for not joining his co-covenantee. Here a valid and sufficient excuse is alleged. He referred to Wms. Saund. p. 291, i, k.

Watson, in reply.—In order to carry out the principle contended for on the other side, it must be shewn that the covenantor assented to contract with one only of the covenantees, otherwise it is imposing on him a different contract from that which he entered into. Many of the old cases are directly in favour of the plaintiff in error; as if an obligation be delivered to one for a third party who dissents, the obligation is gone, so à fortiori where the dissenting party is one of the obligors. Again, if Lord Glenelg had released, the covenant would have been gone; and the reason is, because it is entire and incapable of being severed. The case of the monk, joined as obligor, rests on the principle that he is civiliter mortuus, and therefore not in existence.

[WILDE, C.J.—But the argument deduced from the confidence reposed in the two would equally apply to such a case.]

It is submitted that this Court must treat

this merely as a contract with two; and, therefore, only capable of being enforced by two, so long as both live. Equity will deal with the matter of trust and confidence. As to the deed operating by estoppel, that cannot be, as estoppels must be mutual, and neither of the parties to this action could be estopped by the deed of disclaimer—Com. Dig. tit. 'Estoppel.'

Judgment was now delivered by—

WILDE, C.J.—This case arises on a writ of error on a judgment given for the plaintiff below in the Court of Exchequer, in an action of covenant. The declaration states an indenture of settlement of the 30th of December 1842, purporting to be made between John Mynde Cooke and Eliza his wife of the first part; the defendant of the second part; and the plaintiff and Lord Glenelg of the third part, by which it was witnessed that the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff and Lord Glenelg, their executors, administrators, and assigns, to pay them a certain sum of money in certain instalments, upon trusts mentioned in that indenture. The declaration then states an indenture of the 9th of December 1843, between John Mynde Cooke of the first part, the plaintiff of the second part, and one John Evans of the third part, and purporting to substitute John Evans as trustee of the former settlement in the place of the plaintiff. The declaration goes on to aver that Lord Glenelg never assented to or ratified the first-mentioned indenture; and that, on the 28th of March 1844, by an indenture made between Lord Glenelg of the first part, and the said John Evans of the second part, the said Lord Glenelg disclaimed all the trusts of the first-mentioned indenture; and that the defendant had notice of such indenture of disclaimer. The declaration then states a breach of the covenant to pay certain instalments. To this declaration the defendant demurred; and the Court of Exchequer gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The question raised by this record is, whether the declaration shews a right in the plaintiff to maintain a separate action against the defendant. Much of the argument in this court applied to a different question, that is to say, whether a joint action could have been maintained by the plaintiff, and the other covenantee, Lord Glenelg. But as the question whether the separate action can be maintained may, as it appears to us, be decided upon principles immediately applicable to it, without any intermediate inquiry as to the right to maintain a joint action, we do not think it material to inquire whether such joint action could be maintained. No doubt or difficulty arises in the present case as to the construction of the covenant; it is in terms a joint and not a several covenant, and there is nothing in the subject to which it applies, in the interest of the covenantees, or in the context of the indenture, to require or admit a different construction. It was not disputed on the argument that the covenant was of this description; the right to maintain a separate action not being contended, on the part of the plaintiff, to arise upon any construction of the terms of the covenant itself, but out of the transaction which afterwards took place, as stated in the declaration (the material part of which is the disclaimer of Lord Glenelg), but for which transaction it was properly admitted that the present action could not be maintained. The question, therefore, is, whether that disclaimer has the effect of enabling the plaintiff to sue alone; and this question may be decided upon two very general and well-established rules of law: first, that in order to make a binding contract, the assent of both parties is necessary; the other, that a right to sue upon a contract is not assignable by the act of the party who has such right. This latter rule is subject to exceptions in cases of certain mercantile contracts and of contracts relating to land, which are not applicable to the present case.

To apply the first of these rules to the present case. The only contract to which the assent of the defendant is shewn, is that contained in the settlement of December 1842; the execution of that indenture is the only act of the defendant from which any assent of his can be inferred; from that time he is merely passive; he is no party to the subsequent transaction between Lord Glenelg and Evans, which, therefore, whatever other effect it may have, cannot operate as an assent by him to any contract. It is true, indeed, that a contract may arise upon an instrument under seal between a party who does not execute it and one who does; as where the covenantor executes, but the covenantee, or one of several covenantees, does not; but in that case the covenantee who has not executed, by bringing the action, gives his consent to the contract; and the covenantor having consented, by executing the deed, thence is the consent of both parties. But though a consent to a contract is implied by being a plaintiff in an action upon it, being a defendant certainly does not involve any such consent by him to any contract. That a contract by one person with two jointly, does not comprehend or involve a contract with either of them separately, is evident from the well-known doctrine that a covenant or promise to two, if proved in an action brought by one of them, sustains a plea which denies the existence of the contract. The meaning of the words of the covenant in the present case is, that the defendants will pay the two covenantees; that meaning is the same whether they accept the covenant or not; and the acceptance of one, and the refusal of the other, does not alter the sense, so as to convert it into a covenant to one only. In the case of Petrie v. Bury, which was one of a joint covenant to three, of whom two did not seal the deed, Holroyd, J. says, "The plaintiff is not entitled to sue alone on this covenant; it was made with three persons; and, although two of them did not seal the deed, yet it is not to be converted into a covenant with one: no intention that it should be so is shewn, and by law the covenant does not import that. Supposing the two others had executed, the present plaintiff would not by himself be entitled to recover the whole, or any part of the money; and there is nothing to shew an intention that he should have any such right, in the event of the neglect of the others to execute the deed." This reason applies distinctly to the present case, in which there is nothing to shew an intention that, in the event of Lord Glenelg's refusal, the plaintiff should have the right of recovering the money alone. The present declaration, therefore, does not shew any covenant by the defendant with the plaintiff alone, inasmuch as it shews no consent by him to such a covenant; and without his consent the assent of the plaintiff and Lord Glenelg is inoperative to make a contract binding on him.

The liability, however, to be sued jointly by the two covenantees, to which the defendant did assent, might perhaps be sufficient to sustain the present action, if it were not for the rule secondly above referred to, which prohibits the assignment of the right to enforce such a liability, inasmuch as the indenture of disclaimer sufficiently shews an intention on the part of Lord Glenelg and the plaintiff that the plaintiff shall have the right to sue, which before the execution of that deed might have been exercised by the plaintiff and Lord Glenelg. But there is no doubt that such a right is not by law assignable. The defendant, indeed, does in terms covenant with the plaintiff and Lord Glenelg, their executors, administrators and assigns; but the rule which prohibits the assignment of a right to sue on a covenant is not one which can be dispensed with by the agreement of the parties; and it applies to covenants expressed to be with assigns as well as to others. It was observed in the argument, on the part of the plaintiff, that the covenant in question was not one on which at all events both parties must sue, for that in the event of the plaintiff surviving Lord Glenelg, the joint nature of the covenant would not prevent him from suing alone; and there is no doubt this is so. But in the case of survivorship, as in that of the transfer of the right to sue to the personal representatives of a sole or surviving covenantor, the right of action is transferred by operation of law, not by act of the party. There are many cases in which that may be done by the operation of law which cannot be done by act of the party.

It is laid down by Lord Coke, that "a man by his own act cannot alter the nature of his action, and therefore if the lessee for life or lessee for years do waste, now is an action of waste given to lessor, wherein he shall recover two things, viz. the place wasted, and treble damages; in this case, if the lessor release all actions real he shall not have an action of waste in the personality only, and if he release all actions personal he shall not have an action of waste in the realty only; and so if the lessee doth waste, and after surrender to the lessor his estate, and the lessor accept thereof, the lessor shall not have an action of waste. But by act in law the action may be changed, as if a man make a lease pur terme d'auter vie, and the lessor doth waste, cestui que vie dieth, an action of waste shall lie for damages, only because the other is determined by act in law."

There were also some authorities cited in the argument on the part of the plaintiff, which, it was contended, shewed that by the disclaimer of Lord Glenelg, the plaintiff became solely entitled to the right of action, which but for that disclaimer would have belonged to him jointly with Lord Glenelg. They were cases in which a devise or conveyance to two persons jointly, one of whom disclaimed, has been held to vest the whole estate in the other. But the analogy of those cases is inapplicable, because the subject dealt with was not a mere personal contract, but an interest in land. Now joint obligees or covenantees in personal contracts differ materially from joint tenants of estates in land, in respect of their power of dealing with their rights. An interest in land, whether joint or several, may be transferred by the act of the party; and the conveyance by a joint tenant, by release or otherwise, operates on his moiety only; he may convey it to his co-tenant, or to a stranger; whereas a right to sue on a contract cannot be conveyed, though it may be extinguished, and a release by one of the joint parties extinguishes the right of both. It was upon a similar reason that, in real actions, a nonsuit of one demandant or plaintiff was not the nonsuit of both; but he that made default should be summoned and severed; but in personal actions the nonsuit of one is generally the nonsuit of both—Co. Lit. 139, a. To allow a joint devisee or grantee, &c. of land to vest the whole interest in his co-devisee or grantee, &c., by refusing to accept the estate, is allowing him to do no more than he could have done by a release immediately after acceptance; but if a joint covenantor could, by refusal, enable his co-covenantor to sue alone, he would do that before acceptance which he could by no means do after acceptance.

Since, then, the defendant has not incurred any liability to be sued on a separate contract, and since the plaintiff has not acquired the right to enforce in a separate action any liability to which the defendant might be subject in a joint action, it follows, that whether the defendant's original liability be or be not put an end to, this declaration is bad, and the judgment for the plaintiff ought to be reversed.

May 12.* } JONES v. BONNER AND NASH.

Attorney — Pauper Plaintiff — Release after Action, Setting aside—Costs.

Where a release has been executed by a pauper plaintiff after action brought, and without the knowledge and consent of the attorney, it is matter entirely within the discretion of the Court, whether under the circumstances of the case they will set it aside.

Where such a release has been executed in pursuance of a bonâ fide arrangement between the plaintiff and the defendant, the Court refused to set it aside, although its effect was to deprive the plaintiff of his costs.

This was an action of trespass brought by the plaintiff, who had been admitted to sue in formâ pauperis. Issue had been joined, and notice of trial given for the Herefordshire Spring assizes in 1848. The cause would have been then tried, but on the 4th of March a plea of a release puis darrein continuance was delivered to the plaintiff's attorney, who thereupon countermanded the notice of trial which had been given, and early in the present term the attorney obtained a rule, calling upon the defendants to shew cause why the plea of release puis darrein continuance and the deed of release therein mentioned should not be set aside.

The affidavits filed on either side were somewhat contradictory, but it appeared that the action had been brought for an alleged trespass to the cottage and goods of the plaintiff, committed by the defendant Nash, acting under the command of the other defendant Bonner, who was the plaintiff's landlord. The affidavit of the plaintiff stated that he was sorry that he had executed the release, but that he had been induced to do so by a promise made to him by Bonner, that he would give him a sovereign, and a promise made by one Bodenham that he would put him into a cottage. The attorney swore that he believed that Bonner had fraudulently colluded with the plaintiff to deprive him, the attorney, of his costs, and that the execution of the release was in pursuance of that design. The defendant Bonner in his affidavit denied this, and stated that the plaintiff had come voluntarily to him to settle the action; that he had given the sovereign to assist the plaintiff and his family, who were in very distressed circumstances; that it was then arranged that the plaintiff should sign a release; that a release having been prepared, the plaintiff attended at the house of the defendant Bonner on the 28th of February last; that it was read over to him twice, and explained to him; that no promise of a cottage was held out to him by Bodenham or by any one else, but that he then executed the release of his own free will. There were several other affidavits confirming this account of the transaction.

Martin now shewed cause against the rule.—It is plain from these affidavits that the signing of the release by the plaintiff was his own voluntary act; if so, there is no pretence for setting it aside. If the case of Wright v. Burroughes (1), which will doubtless be relied upon, is to be taken as deciding that under no circumstances can a defendant settle an action with a plaintiff who has been allowed to sue in formâ pauperis, unless with the consent of the plaintiff's attorney, the Court of Common Pleas have gone too far.

Skinner, in support of the rule.—The attorney of a person who has been admitted to sue in formâ pauperis does not stand in the position of the attorney of an ordinary plaintiff. In a pauper suit the attorney gives his skill and time under the belief that his client has good grounds for the action he has brought, and seeks for his recompense out of the costs which, if successful, he will obtain from the defendant. It is upon this ground that the Courts have discountenanced the settling of an action by the plaintiff and the defendant behind the back of an attorney—Wright v. Burroughes.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. In Wright

v. Burroughes the facts were entirely different from those of the present case, and there Chief Justice Tindal appears to have guarded himself from laying down any precise rule of law upon the subject, but to have thought that, under the circumstances of the case, the discretionary power of the Court ought to be exercised to protect the attorney. If the attorney of a plaintiff who has been allowed to sue in formâ pauperis is to be understood as undertaking the cause upon the understanding that he is to be allowed to carry it on to a termination in spite of the plaintiff—that he is dominus litis—then Mr. Skinner's argument should prevail. But in my opinion such is not the understanding. The Courts have not gone further than to say, that if there have been collusion between the plaintiff and the defendant, and the cause has been settled for the purpose of depriving the attorney of his costs, then the Court will interfere to protect him; but such interference has never been extended to a case where a fair, reasonable, and bond fide arrangement has been come to between the plaintiff and the defendant. Instead of setting aside any such arrangement, I should be very sorry to throw any impediment in the way of its being made.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion. In the case of Wright v. Burroughes the late Lord Chief Justice Tindal thus commences his judgment: "I will not say that cases may not arise in which it may be lawful for a pauper plaintiff to settle with the defendant without regard to his attorney's lien." Now, assuming that it is competent for the parties to settle the suit behind the back of the attorney, then this is just one of those cases in which it should be allowed; for the cause of action appears to me to be one in which it is highly probable that nominal damages only would have been recovered: and so far from the defendant Bonner seeking to collude with the plaintiff for the purpose of depriving the attorney of his costs, the plaintiff appears to have pressed the arrangement upon the defendant; for I cannot help expressing an opinion that the affidavit now made by the plaintiff is false, and that when he goes on to say that he much regrets having executed the release, it is the attorney who is putting those words into his mouth for the purposes of this rule. For these reasons I think that the Court ought not to interfere.

PLATT, B.—I entirely concur with the rest of the Court. It appears to me that a plaintiff in a pauper suit is like any other plaintiff, and has a right at any time to put a stop, by any bond fide arrangement he may enter into, to the further progress of the cause. Were this not the case, he would be a mere instrument in the hands of the attorney to extort money in the shape of costs from the defendant. Attornies, before they undertake causes of this description, should inquire into the characters of their clients, and, as they take them for better or for worse, should see that they are honest men, not rogues and vagabonds. But it is said that in this case the arrangement had for its object to cheat the attorney of his costs; if that were clearly the object of the parties, the attorney ought perhaps to be protected: but upon these affidavits I do not see that this was the object of the defendant Bonner, but, on the contrary, that he became a party to an arrangement which was urged upon him by the plaintiff, and the effect of which was to put a stop to a vexatious action, in which it is probable only nominal damages would have been obtained.

Assumpsit by the indorsees against the drawer of a bill of exchange for 25l., payable at three months, indorsed by the defendant to Thomas Reginald Kemp, and by him to the plaintiffs.

Second plea, that the indorsement by Thomas Reginald Kemp was an indorsement in blank, and that after the bill was indorsed to the plaintiffs, and on the day when it became due, the said Thomas Reginald Kemp paid to the plaintiffs the said sum of 25l. in the said bill specified, according to the tenour and effect thereof and of his indorsement, in full satisfaction and discharge of the said sum of 25l. in the said bill specified; and the plaintiffs then delivered the said bill to the said Thomas Reginald Kemp, who from the time of such payment and delivery until and at and after the time when this action was commenced, hath been and still is the holder of the said bill, and the defendant then became and was and is liable to pay the said sum in the said bill specified to the said Thomas Reginald Kemp. Verification.

Replication, that at the time of the commencement of this suit the plaintiffs were the holders of the said bill; without this, that at the time of the commencement of this suit the said Thomas Reginald Kemp was the holder thereof modo et forma. Conclusion to the country.

The cause was tried before Pollock, C.B., at the London sittings after Michaelmas term last, when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

Knowles moved (Jan. 14) for a repleader. —The replication contains an admission that the bill has been satisfied, and that the sum of 25l. was paid by Kemp to the plaintiffs, and received by them in satisfaction of the bill. The plaintiffs did not, therefore, hold the bill for themselves, but for Kemp, who was the proper party to bring the action. Without doubt that would be the case if the defendant had been the acceptor. Bacon v. Searles (1) shews that where the indorser of a bill of exchange receives part of the contents of the bill from the drawer, he cannot recover more than the residue from the acceptor, and that where the drawer pays the whole the acceptor is discharged.

[PARKE, B.—May not the plaintiffs continue the suit for the benefit of another party? If Kemp allows them to keep the bill, it is the same as allowing them to sue for him. According to the finding of the jury, Kemp was not entitled to bring the action, as the bill had not been given up to him.]

Stones v. Butt (2) is in point. There the plaintiff was not, at the time when the defendant was arrested, in possession of the bill of exchange on which the action was brought, but it was in the possession of the person to whom the plaintiff was indebted; and to whom he had indorsed it over; but it appeared that those persons only held the bill as trustees for the plaintiff, and that they were ready to give up possession of the bill to him for the purposes of the suit. The Court held that the defendant was not entitled to be discharged out of custody. He also referred to Byles on Bills, p. 305.

[PARKE, B.—Are not the plaintiffs to be considered the holders of the bill if it is assumed that they held it for Kemp?]

Kemp was entitled to the possession of the bill, and therefore could have brought the action; how then could other parties have a right to bring it?

[PARKE, B.—How is this an immaterial issue? We have already decided that it is material (3).]

Knowles then contended that the verdict was contrary to the evidence.

The Court having taken time to consider the latter point,—

POLLOCK, C.B. now said.—In this case there will be no rule. A motion was made to this Court for a repleader, the ground being that the issue raised in the replication to the second plea was immaterial. [His Lordship stated the pleadings.] We think the issue raised was material, and therefore must refuse a rule.

Rule refused.

June 10. } AND ANOTHER.

Bankrupt—Reputed Ownership—Deed, Construction of—Partnership—Estoppel.

By a deed of trust, W, a horse contractor and jobber, assigned, until such time as all his then debts should be paid off, all his stock in trade, &c. to certain trustees for the benefit of his creditors, to hold upon certain trusts, inter alia that so long as W. should observe the orders of the trustees he was to be allowed to carry on and conduct the business, subject to the orders of the trustees; that if he refused to comply with those orders, the trustees might immediately determine such permission; that the trustees should have power to sell any portion of the stock they pleased; that all monies received in the business were to be paid to the account of the trustees, and all monies paid by their cheques; and that W. was to receive a weekly salary for carrying on the business. The creditors also agreed to advance a large sum of money for the purposes of the business. This sum was advanced, and the business was carried on for some time under the terms of the deed, but W. having refused to comply with certain orders of the trustees, the trustees, on the 22nd of July 1847, determined the permission to W. to carry on the business, and W. thereupon admitted in writing that the trustees had his leave to assume possession of the stock in trade, &c. Several of the horses used in the business were at that time let out on hire to various persons, and the trustees on that day served notice upon each of those persons that the horses in their possession belonged to them as trustees. On the 24th of July W. committed an act of bankruptcy. Upon an interpleader issue to try the title to these horses as between the trustees and the assignees,—Held, upon these facts, first, that by the deed no partnership was created between W. and the trustees.

Secondly, that by allowing W. to carry on the business in his own name the trustees were not estopped from relying upon their own title to the property under the deed as against the assignees.

Thirdly, that the horses were not at the time of the bankruptcy in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt within the meaning of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 72.

(3) Rogers v. Chilton, ante, p. 8.

Interpleader issue to try whether, on the 24th of July 1847, certain horses claimed by the defendants, as assignees under the bankruptcy of one Wiggins, and by the plaintiffs, as trustees under a deed of trust for themselves and other creditors of Wiggins, were the property of the plaintiffs as against the assignees.

At the trial of the issue, which took place before Parke, B., at the sittings in last Trinity term, it appeared, that the bankrupt Wiggins, who had been carrying on business as a horse contractor, having become embarrassed, and a meeting of his creditors having taken place, in pursuance of an agreement then come to, a deed was executed, on the 23rd of August 1844, by Wiggins of the first part, the plaintiffs of the second part, and the remainder of the creditors of the third part, by which Wiggins assigned to the plaintiffs, as trustees of the creditors, until such time as all his debts to them should be paid off, all his stock in trade, &c., to hold upon certain trusts, inter alia, that so long as Wiggins should observe the orders and directions of the plaintiffs, he was to be allowed to carry on the business and conduct the same, subject to the orders of the plaintiffs; that if Wiggins refused or failed to comply with these orders, the plaintiffs might immediately determine the permission; that the plaintiffs should have power to sell and dispose of any portion of the stock they pleased; that all monies received in the business were to be paid into a banker's hands, and only drawn out by the cheques of the plaintiffs, and that Wiggins was to receive the wages of 5*l.* a week for conducting the business. The creditors agreed also to advance a large sum of money for the purpose of carrying on the business, and which sum was afterwards advanced accordingly.

After the execution of this deed Wiggins continued to carry on the business, his name appeared written up at the place of business, and parties dealt with him; but the plaintiffs, in pursuance of the provisions of the deed, gave him directions from time to time, and he accounted to them for the proceeds, &c. of the business. So matters continued until July 1847, when the plaintiffs having discovered that Wiggins had been accepting bills of exchange to a considerable amount, and had concealed the fact from the plaintiffs, a meeting of the creditors was held on the 22nd of July, and in pursuance of the resolution then come to, the plaintiffs gave Wiggins notice that he had acted improperly and contrary to their directions, and that they, therefore, put an end to his any longer carrying on the business. Upon the receipt of that notice, Wiggins made the following memorandum of admission:—"I hereby agree and admit that conformably with the provisions of the deed of trust, &c. the right has accrued to the trustees of determining and putting an end to their permission to my carrying on my trade and business mentioned in the said deed, and that they have exercised that right and put an end to that permission; and further that in obedience to such act of theirs they have, with my leave, licence, and assent, assumed the entire possession and controul of the said trade, business, stock in trade, &c." At this time many of the horses belonging to the estate were in the possession of various persons to whom Wiggins had at different times let them on job in the way of his business, and these transactions of letting had taken place between Wiggins solely, in his own name, and the several persons to whom the horses had been let, without any participation or interference on the part of the plaintiffs, whose names did not appear in the transactions. On the same 22nd of July the plaintiffs gave a notice in writing to each of these parties, that the horses in their possession belonged to the plaintiffs as trustees under the deed, and requiring them "not to part with the said horses, or any of them, nor to pay for the hire thereof to any other person than to the plaintiffs." On the 24th of July Wiggins committed an act of bankruptcy, upon which a fiat in bankruptcy afterwards issued, and the defendants became assignees. As such assignees they made claim to the horses which formed the subject of this issue.

It appeared further, at the trial, that during the time which had elapsed from the execution of the deed to that of the bankruptcy, some of the horses had been sold and others purchased as well out of the monies advanced by the creditors as before mentioned as out of the incomings of the business, but all were mixed up together, and it became impossible to distinguish between horses purchased after and those purchased before the deed. The sum realized by these horses, and all the stock in trade of the bankrupt, amounted to much less than the sum due to his old creditors.

It was contended, on behalf of the assignees, that as to those horses which were afterwards purchased, the property in them did not pass to the plaintiffs by operation of the deed; secondly, that the effect of the deed was to make Wiggins a partner with the plaintiffs in the business; thirdly, that the plaintiffs having allowed the bankrupt to carry on the business in his own name were estopped from saying that he was their servant only; and, lastly, that, under the circumstances of the case, the horses must be considered to be in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt, within the meaning of 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 72.

Upon the first point, the learned Judge asked the opinion of the jury, whether they were satisfied that there had been any appropriation by the bankrupt to the trustees of all the horses purchased since the execution of the deed. Upon the other points, he ruled against the defendants. The jury found a general verdict for the plaintiffs.

Montagu Chambers now moved for a new trial, upon the ground of misdirection.—First, the jury having found that the bankrupt appropriated the horses which were purchased after the execution of the deed to the trustees, it must be admitted they became their property; but having become so, they allowed them to remain in the disposition of the bankrupt, and, if so, they became the property of the assignees. Secondly, the legal effect of the deed of the 23rd of August 1844, was to make the bankrupt a partner in the business with the trustees. He was interested in the profits, for the larger they were the greater progress he made in the discharge of his liabilities. He derived, therefore, such a benefit from the business as to make him in law a partner.

[ALDERSON, B.—The effect of the deed is, that so long as the trustees have any interest in the business the bankrupt has none; and as soon as the bankrupt begins to take any interest, that of the trustees is to cease. How can you say that they were partners?]

be enabled to pay the debts to the creditors and retain any surplus to himself—Grace v. Smith (1). Thirdly, as the trustees have put the bankrupt forward as the apparent owner of these horses, they are estopped from saying as against those who became creditors of the bankrupt after the execution of the deed, that he was not the owner—Pickard v. Sears (2), Gragg v. Wells (3).

ALDERSON, B.—I am of opinion that no rule should be granted in this case. To dispose of the last point first: it has been argued that these horses were the property of the assignees, because the bankrupt was in possession of them at the time of the bankruptcy as reputed owner. Was he in possession of them as reputed owner with the consent of the true owner? For that is the question. Now, in the case of Smith v. Topping (4), I ruled at Nisi Prius, and the Court of Queen's Bench afterwards upheld my ruling, that where the true owner of goods allowed the bankrupt to retain possession of them as reputed owner up to the day before the bankruptcy, but upon that day demanded them, they could not be said to be in the possession of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner at the date of the bankruptcy. So in the present case, as soon as the trustees gave notice to the parties who had the horses that the bankrupt had no longer any interest in them, that put an end to the reputed ownership. But then, it is said, that the bankrupt was the true owner of the horses, for that the effect of the deed of trust was to make him a partner with the trustees in carrying on the business. Inasmuch, however, as there was no community of profit and loss between these parties at one and the same time, there was clearly no partnership in point of law between them. Lastly, it was argued, that as the trustees put forward the bankrupt as the person ostensibly carrying on the business and as the apparent owner of these horses, they are estopped as against the future creditors of the bankrupt from saying that he was not the owner. If that proposition could be maintained, its effect would be to make wild work with the bankrupt law. The cases only go to this extent, that where a party makes an actual representation to another intending that he should act upon it, and the latter does so, such person shall not be put into a worse position by reason of such representation being false than he would be were it true. But this doctrine has no application to the facts of the present case.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the effect of the deed of the 24th of August 1844 was clearly not to create any partnership between the bankrupt and the trustees. With respect to the other point, I should very much doubt whether where goods are in the possession of third parties, they can be said to be in the possession, order or disposition of the bankrupt at all: in other words, whether a constructive possession of them by the bankrupt is sufficient; but it is unnecessary to canvass that proposition, for after the notice was given by the trustees it is impossible to contend that they could be any longer in the bankrupt's possession, order or disposition with the consent of the true owner.

PLATT, B. concurred.

PARKE, B.—I remain entirely of the opinion which I expressed at the trial. As soon as the facts appeared, I thought the law applicable to them was as plain as possible. The first question which arose was, whether all the horses were the property of the assignees. I thought, under the authority of Lunn v. Thornton (5), that there was a doubt whether the property in those horses which were purchased after the execution of the deed passed to the trustees, unless they had been afterwards appropriated to them by the bankrupt. I left, therefore, that fact to the jury, and they found, in effect, that the bankrupt had so appropriated them. That point was therefore disposed of. It has been argued now that the trustees, by allowing the bankrupt to deal with these horses as his own were estopped from saying as against the future creditors that they were not so; but that is carrying out the doctrine laid down in Pickard v.

Sears to an extent not at all warranted by that decision. Had the trustees entered into any stipulation that future creditors should satisfy themselves out of the goods employed in the business, or had represented to such creditors that the bankrupt was really the party interested in the business, and upon that representation such creditors had dealt with the bankrupt, they might have been estopped from afterwards setting up a different state of facts; but that is not at all the case here. I quite concur with what has fallen from the rest of the Court with respect to the question of reputed ownership; and with respect to the construction of the deed, I may observe that not only in my opinion did no partnership arise out of it, but that also inasmuch as the assignees can, independently of the question of reputed ownership which has been disposed of, only claim under the bankrupt as respects the actual ownership, that then, inasmuch as the bankrupt admitted the property in these horses to be in the trustees, it is not open to the assignees to say that they are not.

The 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 4. does not extend to costs. Where, therefore, a warrant of two Justices of the county of S. commanded the constable to apprehend and take A. B. to the House of Correction, there to remain until payment of a sum, made up of the arrears of poor-rate due from him and of costs awarded,—Held, that such warrant was altogether bad; and that an action of trespass lay against the Justices and the constable for the arrest and imprisonment under it.

The backing of such a warrant by a Magistrate, under 24 Geo. 2. c. 55, is merely a ministerial act, and the Justices who originally issued the warrant are responsible for the arrest under it, although made in a different county from that in which it was issued.

Where a party arrested under such warrant paid under protest the whole amount mentioned therein, he was entitled in an action of trespass brought for such arrest to recover as damages the whole amount so paid by him.

Under the 24 Geo. 2. c. 44. a demand of the perusal and copy of the warrant under which a constable has acted, which is in writing and signed by the plaintiff's attorney, is sufficient, although it has been left at the constable's place of abode by a person other than the attorney.

When, previous to such demand being made, the plaintiff has by other means obtained a copy of the warrant, that does not excuse the constable from complying with the demand, if he seek to avail himself of the protection given by that statute.

The mere fact of the Justices who issued the warrant being sued jointly with the constable, does not entitle the latter to a verdict, the last clause of the 24 Geo. 2. c. 44. s. 6. only applying to actions brought after the demand of the perusal and copy of the warrant has been complied with by the constable.

1848. { In the matter of the arbitration
May 4. { between the NORTH STAFFORD-SHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY AND LANDOR AND OTHERS.

Railway—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18. ss. 23, 25.—Arbitration—Notice of Appointment of Arbitrator—Award—Attachment.

The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 Vict. c. 18. enacts, sec. 23, with respect to lands required to be taken for the purposes of the undertaking, that if the party claiming compensation desires to have the same settled by arbitration, and gives a notice in writing thereof to the promoters, stating therein the nature of his interest, and the amount of compensation claimed, the same shall be so settled.

Section 25. enacts, that in questions of disputed arbitration, unless both parties concur in the appointment of a single arbitrator, each may appoint an arbitrator, and such appointment shall be deemed a submission to arbitration on the part of the party by whom the same shall be made.

The North Staffordshire Railway Company requiring certain lands for the purposes of their railway, gave notice thereof to T. L. R. H. and R. H. the parties interested therein, and received from them a notice which stated that they had and claimed an estate and interest in certain copyhold lands and hereditaments, situated in, &c. and required to be taken by the company, and that they claimed compensation for the said lands and hereditaments to the amount of 3,344l. 17s. 6d., that they desired to have the same compensation settled by arbitration, and appointed T. H. one of the arbitrators. Another arbitrator having been appointed by the company, and an umpire nominated by the arbitrators, a claim for compensation was made by one T. W. who alleged that he had a leasehold interest in the said lands. The umpire awarded that the sum of 1,861l. 2s. 6d. should be paid by the company to T. L. R. H. and R. H. as such trustees for the purchase of the fee simple in possession, free from all incumbrances of and in the said copyhold lands, &c. required to be taken by the company, but omitted to adjudicate upon T. W.'s interest. The company took possession of the land in question.

A motion to set aside the award having been made on the ground that the umpire had not apportioned the sums to be paid to T. L. R. H. and R. H. for their limited interest in the land, and the sum to be paid to T. W. for his interest,—The Court refused to set aside the award.

But held:—that the award was insufficient on the ground of the arbitrators not having found the value of the interest of T. L. R. H. and R. H. and awarded a distinct compensation on that account.

But, quære, whether it was not binding on the parties by reason of their conduct.

Semble, that the notice of T. L. R. H. and R. H. which constituted the submission, was not conformable to the statute, and therefore that the award could not be enforced by attachment.

This was a rule calling upon Thomas Landor, Richard Hughes, and Robert

Hughes, to shew cause why an award should not be set aside under the following circumstances :—The North Staffordshire Railway Company, who were incorporated by an act of parliament passed in 1846, requiring certain land for the purposes of their railway, gave notice under the 18th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 Vict. c. 18. (1), to Thomas Landor, Richard Hughes, and Robert Hughes, the parties interested in the said land, that they required to purchase the land. Landor and the two others accordingly sent to the company the following notice :—

(1) The following sections are important:—

The 18th section enacts, That when the promoters of the undertaking require to purchase any lands, they shall give notice to the parties interested in such lands, shall demand the particulars of their estate and interest, and state the particulars of the lands so required.

Section 23. enacts, That if the compensation claimed or offered exceeds 50*l.*, and the party claiming compensation desires an arbitration, and signifies such desire by notice in writing to the promoters before they have issued their demand for a jury, stating in such notice the nature of the interest in respect of which such party claims compensation, and the amount of compensation so claimed, the same shall be so settled accordingly.

Sect. 25. "Where any question of disputed compensation by this or the special act, or any act incorporated therewith, authorized or required to be settled by arbitration shall have arisen, then, unless both parties shall concur in the appointment of a single arbitrator, each party, on the request of the other party, shall nominate and appoint an arbitrator, to whom such dispute shall be referred; and every appointment of an arbitrator shall be made on the part of the promoters of the undertaking, under the hands of the said promoters, or any two of them, or of their secretary or clerk, or on the part of any other party under the hand of such party, or if such party be a corporation aggregate, under the common seal of such corporation; and such appointment shall be delivered to the arbitrator, and shall be deemed a submission to arbitration on the part of the party by whom the same shall be made."

Sect. 37. "No award made with respect to any question referred to arbitration under the provisions of this or the special act, shall be set aside for irregularity or error in matter of form."

Sect. 63. relates to the mode of estimating the purchase-money and compensation.

Sect. 68. enacts, That where the compensation claimed exceeds 50*l.*, the party claiming it may have it settled by arbitration or by a jury.

Sect. 94. enacts, That where land shall be so cut through as to leave on either side of the works a piece of land of less extent than half an acre, the promoters of the undertaking may, under certain circumstances, insist upon purchasing such land.

"To the North Staffordshire Railway Company, &c.—We, the undersigned Thomas Landor, Richard Hughes, and Robert Hughes, do hereby give you notice, that as trustees named and appointed in and by the last will and testament of Francis Figgins, of &c., we have and claim an estate and interest in certain copyhold lands and hereditaments, situate in Sutton, in the parish of Prestbury, in the county of Chester, required to be purchased or taken by the said company for the purposes of their said railway; and that we do claim compensation for the said lands and hereditaments, and that the sum of 3,344*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* is the amount of compensation we so claim.

"And we do hereby give you notice and require you to purchase a certain plot of land, part of the said lands and hereditaments, situate in Sutton aforesaid, which will be cut off and divided by the works of the said railway, and adjoining or near to the plot of land numbered 422 in the plan and book of reference of the said company. And we do hereby signify our desire to have the same compensation settled by arbitration. And we do hereby nominate and appoint Thomas Hill, of &c., to be one of the arbitrators in the premises; and we do hereby request you to nominate and appoint another arbitrator, to which said arbitrators, or their umpire, the said claim shall be referred.

"Dated this 15th day of May 1847.

"Thomas Landor,

"Richard Hughes,

"Robert Hughes."

The railway company, on receiving this notice, sent the following notice to Landor and the others, dated the 19th of May 1847 :—

"Whereas the North Staffordshire Railway Company require to purchase and take certain lands and hereditaments for the purposes of the North Staffordshire Railway, situate in &c., and which are wholly or part of the lands and hereditaments numbered 317, 401, 402, 413, 416, 417, and part of 422, in the plan and book of reference for the railway authorized to be constructed by the said excited act, for the said parish of Prestbury. And whereas on the 14th day of January last, a notice of the intention of the North Staffordshire Railway Company to purchase and take for the purposes aforesaid the said lands and hereditaments, was duly served on T. Landor ; and on the 15th day of January last a notice of such intention was duly served on Richard Hughes and Robert Hughes, as the owners of, or as parties interested in the said lands and hereditaments, or as parties enabled by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, to sell and convey or release the same lands and hereditaments to the said company ; and the said lands and hereditaments so required as aforesaid were on the said notices so served on you as aforesaid for better description delineated on the plan attached to each of the said notices so delivered therewith, and were therein distinguished by a red colour. And whereas they have stated the particulars of their claim in respect of the said lands and hereditaments to be that such lands and hereditaments are of copyhold tenure, and you claim the sum of 3,344*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* as compensation for the same lands and hereditaments ; and they and the said company have not agreed as to the amount of compensation to be paid by the said company for the interest in such lands belonging to them, or which they are by the acts before recited or referred to enabled to sell, and for the damage to be sustained by them by reason of the execution of the works of the said railway. And whereas the said T. Landor, R. Hughes, and R. Hughes have by notice in writing, bearing date the 15th day of May instant, signified to the said company their desire to have the question of such compensation settled by arbitration : Now I, the undersigned, Jonathan Samuda, secretary to the said North Staffordshire Railway Company, do hereby nominate and appoint Thomas Kempson, of &c., as arbitrator on behalf of the said company, to whom, with the arbitrator appointed by the said T. Landor, R. Hughes, and R. Hughes, shall be referred the question as to the amount of compensation to be paid by the said company for the purchase of the said lands and hereditaments, or of the interest of the said T. Landor, R. Hughes, and R. Hughes therein, or for the interest of any other person or persons which by the said acts hereinbefore recited or referred to, you the said T. Landor, R. Hughes, and R. Hughes are enabled to sell, and also for the damage that may be sustained by the said T. Landor, R. Hughes, and R. Hughes, or such person or persons as aforesaid, by reason of the execution of the works of the said company.

"Dated this 19th day of May 1847.

"J. Samuda,

"Secretary to the said North Staffordshire Railway Company."

The arbitrators having appointed an umpire under the 27th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 Vict. c. 18, several meetings took place, at which a Mr. Wright claimed compensation from the company in respect of the lands in question, on the ground of his being lessee of the lands for seven years from Christmas 1846. The two arbitrators having failed to make their award within the time limited by the 31st section of the above act, the umpire on the 8th of November made his award as follows :—

"I do hereby award and determine that the sum of 1,861*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* is the value, and shall be paid by the North Staffordshire Railway Company to the said Thomas Landor, Richard Hughes, and Robert Hughes, as such trustees as aforesaid, for the purchase of the fee simple in possession, free from all incumbrances, of and in the said copyhold lands, tenements, and hereditaments, described in the said first-recited notice, and delineated on the plan thereunto attached or delivered therewith, and therein coloured red, and required to be purchased and taken as aforesaid ; and that the further sum of 1,040*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* shall be paid by the said company to the said T. Landor, R. Hughes, and R. Hughes, as such trustees as aforesaid, as compensation for the damage that has been or will be sustained by the said T. Landor, R. Hughes, and R. Hughes, as such trustees as aforesaid, by reason of the execution of the said railway and works, and also of the severing of the same lands and hereditaments from the other lands of the said T. Landor, R. Hughes, and R. Hughes, as such trustees as aforesaid, or otherwise injuriously affecting such other lands by the exercise of the powers of the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, or of the act or acts authorizing the said railway and works, or any act incorporated therewith."

On the 16th of December, the solicitors to the company sent to Mr. Landor's solicitors a copy of the award, apprising them at the same time of Mr. Wright's claim to compensation; and stating that in the event of Wright taking proceedings against the company to obtain compensation, they should deduct the amount from the purchase-money. Mr. Landor's solicitors returned for answer, that they would not allow the company to make any deduction. The company afterwards took possession of the land. The main grounds on which the rule nisi was obtained were as follows:—

"That the umpire has not in or by his said award, decided what is the amount of the compensation to be paid by the North Staffordshire Railway Company for the interest of Thomas Landor, Richard Hughes, and Robert Hughes, in the lands and hereditaments in the award mentioned, required by the said company to be purchased and taken. That the said T. Landor, R. Hughes, and R. Hughes, having a limited interest only in the said lands and hereditaments, and not being enabled by the said acts of parliament in the award mentioned, or otherwise, to sell the interest therein of Thomas Wright in the affidavit in this case mentioned, and such interest of the said T. Wright having been notified to and proved before the said umpire, he the said umpire ought to have awarded a distinct sum for the said interest of the said T. Landor, R. Hughes, and R. Hughes, and by his only awarding a gross sum for the fee simple in possession, free from all incumbrances, it cannot be ascertained what amount is to be paid to the said T. Landor, R. Hughes, and R. Hughes, for their interest in the said lands and hereditaments, and that there is no machinery in the said acts or either of them to apportion or ascertain the proportion of the said sum of 1,861*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* in the said award mentioned, which is to be paid to them, and the proportion thereof which is to be paid to the said T. Wright, or to any other incumbrancer or person entitled to any interest in the said lands and hereditaments.

"That the said award does not decide upon what was submitted to the arbitrators and umpire, and upon what was the matter in difference before them, namely, the amount to be paid for compensation for the interest in the said lands belonging to the said T. Landor, R. Hughes, and R. Hughes, or which they are or were by the acts in the said awards mentioned, or either of them, enabled to sell; and that such compensation cannot be ascertained, and is not decided by the umpire's finding a gross sum for the fee simple in possession. That by reason of the several foregoing reasons, the award is not certain or final."

Martin shewed cause.—One of the grounds on which the Railway Company attempt to set aside this award is, that the notice of the 15th of May, appointing an arbitration, is defective. The 25th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 Vict. c. 18, enacts, that the appointment of an arbitrator "shall be deemed a submission to arbitration on the part of the party by whom the same shall be made;" and the objection will be that the submission is not made under the statute, and therefore is invalid. That objection cannot, however, be sustained, after the company have taken possession of the land. The 37th section enacts, that an award shall not be set aside for irregularity or error in form.

[PARKE, B.—The arbitrators are bound to state the value of the interest which the parties are able to convey. The award is insufficient, for the arbitrator does not find the value of that interest; he only finds that if the parties are able to convey, the value is so much.]

The question really referred is as to the amount of compensation, and the award finds this in terms. Besides, the award ought not to be set aside on such a ground, for by sections 77. & 78. the purchase-money may in certain cases be deposited, and may be distributed by the Court of Chancery. The arbitrator has no power under the act of parliament to adjudicate upon the several interests of the parties; he can only value what the parties say they are possessed of.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—We think we ought not to interfere with the award. The point is doubtful, and the question may be tried elsewhere.]

[PARKE, B.—I think it is doubtful whether the award is valid. The question submitted to the arbitrator is not exactly according to the statute, and consequently the award could not be forced by attachment. There has been no statutory submission. The award ought not to be set aside, because it is at the least very doubtful whether the award is not binding on the parties by reason of their conduct, which may be called their parol and non-statutory submission.]

[PLATT, B.—The umpire ought to have given Landor and the others a compensation for their interest minus that of Wright.]

[PARKE, B.—The umpire has not decided as he ought the question of the fee simple.] He was then stopped by the Court. Crompton, in support of the rule.

Railway—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 Vict. c. 18, ss. 18, 25—Arbitration—Submission—Excess of Jurisdiction.

*The North Staffordshire Railway Company having, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 Vict. c. 18, given to C. W. and R. W. landowners, notice to treat for the taking of certain portions of their land, the latter thereupon served a notice upon the company, stating themselves to be owners and lessees of the land in question, that their interests were more particularly described in a schedule of claims served therewith; that they claimed 2,280*l.* 8*s.* as compensation for the purchase-money and for damage arising from the execution of the railway works (claiming in the schedule in respect of the value of the land and for compensation for severance and damage); that if the amount were not paid, they required the matter to be settled by arbitration, and desired the company to appoint an arbitrator on their behalf. The company then served C. W. and R. W. with a similar notice, appointing an arbitrator to whom was to be* *referred the amount of compensation to be paid by the company for the purchase of the lands, or of the interests of C. W. and R. W., or of any other person, which C. W. and R. W. were enabled to sell. By the 8 Vict. c. 18, s. 25, these notices respectively constituted a submission by each party to arbitration. At the hearing before the umpire, C. W. and R. W. gave evidence of the value of certain small pieces of land, which being severed by the works of the company, C. W. and R. W. contended the latter were bound to purchase. This evidence was objected to by the company, but received by the umpire. The umpire awarded that the sum of 1,444*l.* should be paid by the company to C. W. for the purchase of the fee simple, the copyhold and leasehold interest, and that the further sum of 732*l.* should be paid to C. W. and R. W. as compensation for the damage sustained by the execution of the works and of the severing or otherwise injuriously affecting of the said lands.*

*The company having applied to set aside this award, on the ground, amongst others, that the umpire had exceeded his authority in awarding one gross sum for the land required by the company, and the land required by C. W. and R. W. to be taken by the company, inasmuch as the company had not agreed to submit to arbitration the purchase of the last-mentioned land:—Held, that the award was bad, and could not be enforced, as nothing had been submitted but the value of the land required by the company; but the Court refused to set the award aside.**

This was a rule calling upon Charles Wood and Richard Wood to shew cause why an award or compensation should not be set aside under the following circumstances:—On the 13th of December 1846, the North Staffordshire Railway Company, in pursuance of the 18th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 Vict. c. 18, gave to Charles and Richard Wood notice to treat for the purchase of certain lands, situated in Prestbury, in the county of Chester, numbered 374, 375, 376, and 377 in the company's book of reference, and described in a plan thereunto annexed; and in June 1847 they served them with another notice to treat for other land, numbered 372 and 372<sup>a</sup>. The Messrs. Wood then served the company with a notice of the appointment of an arbitrator. In this notice they stated themselves to be owners in fee and in copyhold tenure, and also lessees of the lands mentioned in the company's notices, and that their interests therein are particularly described in the owners' schedule of claims, served by them therewith, and that they claimed the sum of 2,280*l.* 8*s.* as compensation for the purchase-money for the same, and for the damage that might be sustained by them by reason of the execution of the railway works; that if the amount thereof was not paid, they thereby signified their desire to have the amount of the compensation to be paid to them settled by arbitration; and they required the company to appoint an arbitrator to act on behalf of the company in the said arbitration. In the owners' schedule, annexed to this notice, the Messrs. Wood claimed a portion of the 2,280*l.* 8*s.* for the value of certain land, another portion on account of severance and damage done to the adjoining land and water, and the residue for the value and compensation in respect of three pieces of land numbered 372<sup>a</sup>, 374, and 375. In the month of September, the company served the Messrs. Wood with a notice of the appointment of an arbitrator. This notice, after reciting the substance of the company's two notices to treat, and specifying the amount of land required by them, recited the claim made by the Messrs. Wood in their appointment of arbitrator, and then proceeded in these terms:—

"Now we, the said North Staffordshire Railway Company, hereby, under the hand of me, the undersigned, J. Samuda, secretary to the said company, nominate and appoint George Clarke Pauling, of &c., arbitrator, to whom shall be referred the question as to the amount of compensation to be paid by the said company for the purchase of the said lands and hereditaments, or of the interest of the said Richard Wood and Charles Wood therein, and for the interest of any other person or persons, which by the said acts hereinbefore recited or referred to, they the said Richard Wood and Charles Wood are enabled to sell."

The two arbitrators having nominated an umpire, and proceeded with the reference, the Messrs. Wood gave evidence of the value of certain small portions of land, numbered in their schedule 372<sup>a</sup>, 374, and 375, which would be severed by the works of the company, and which being of less amount than half an acre respectively, they contended the company were bound, under the 94th section, to purchase. This evidence was received by the arbitrators, although it was objected to by the company on the ground that it was not included in the lands specified or alluded to in the company's appointment of an arbitrator, which constituted their submission to arbitration. The arbitrators having failed to make their award within the time limited by the act of parliament, the umpire made his award, in these terms:—

"I do hereby award and determine that the sum of 1,444*l.* is the value, and shall be paid by the said North Staffordshire Railway Company to the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood, for the purchase of the fee simple in possession and copyhold tenure and interest, free from all incumbrances, except the usual copyhold rent and services in respect of the said copyhold land and hereditaments, and also the leasehold interest as set forth in the said claim of the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood, of and in the said lands, tenements and hereditaments, described in the before recited notices, and delineated in the plans to the same notices respectively attached or delivered therewith, and therein coloured red, and required to be purchased and taken by the said company as aforesaid, and also required by the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood, in their notice and claim delivered to the said company, to be purchased and taken by the said company, as aforesaid, subject nevertheless as to the said leasehold tenements to a proportionate part of the said rent of 210*l.*, to which the same with other tenements is subject and liable, according to the quantity of land taken, and to be apportioned under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. And that the further sum of 732*l.* shall be paid by the same company to the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood, as compensation for the damage that has been or shall be sustained by the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood, by reason of the execution of the said railway and works, and also of the severing of the same lands, tenements, and hereditaments from the other lands, tenements, and hereditaments of the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood, or otherwise injuriously affecting any other lands, by the exercise of the powers of the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, or of the act or acts authorizing the said railway and works, or any act incorporated therewith."

This award the railway company moved to set aside, on the following amongst other grounds:—That the umpire had exceeded his authority by awarding one gross sum for the purchase of the land required to be purchased and taken by the North Staffordshire Railway Company, and of the land required by Charles Wood and Richard Wood, in their notice and claim in the said award mentioned, to be taken and purchased by the said company, inasmuch as the umpire had no authority to award any sum in respect of the last-mentioned land, that is to say, the land required by the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood, to be taken and purchased as aforesaid, or to make any award or umpirage as to such last-mentioned land. And as it cannot be known or ascertained from the said award how much of the said sum of money so awarded for the purchase is awarded in respect of the land required by the said company, and how much is awarded in respect of the land required by the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood to be taken; and the award is therefore bad altogether. That the umpire has included in his award, and awarded upon matter not submitted to him, that is to say, the amount of the purchase-money of the land not required by the company to be taken, but required by the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood to be taken. That the umpire has not decided, nor can it be ascertained from the said award, what is the amount to be paid for the purchase of the land required by the company to be taken and purchased. That the award does not shew how much of the sum of 1,444*l.* in the said award mentioned, is awarded in respect of the purchase of the said land required by the said company; and that the said award is uncertain therein, and does not, in consequence thereof, decide the matter submitted, namely, the amount to be paid for the purchase of the land required by the said company to be taken and purchased. That the award or umpirage is void, as the two parties thereto never agreed upon the same subject-matter for the arbitrators or umpire to decide, and that the said company only agreed that the award should be as to the land required by them to be taken; whereas the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood only agreed that the award should be both as to the land required by the company to be taken, and the land required by themselves, the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood, to be taken; and the company never consented or submitted to be bound by any award or umpirage, including the amount to be paid for the purchase of the land required by the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood to be taken; and the said Charles Wood and Richard Wood never agreed to be bound by any award or umpirage which should not include the amount to be paid for the purchase of the said last-mentioned land."

Martin and Townsend shewed cause.—It must be conceded on the part of the Messrs. Wood that the award cannot be supported if it includes not only the land which the company intended to take and use for the purposes of the railway, but also that which being in smaller portions than half an acre, they were bound by the 94th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 Vict. c. 18. to take and pay for. It is submitted, however, that the award does not include the latter description of land, or if it does, that the schedule and notice of appointment of arbitrators delivered by the Messrs. Wood gave the arbitrators or umpire power to adjudicate upon this land. They referred to The Queen v. the Trustees of Swansea Harbour (1).

[PARKER, B.—The proceedings are all wrong; but whether we ought to set aside the award is a different question.]

Crompton, contra.—The umpire had no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon those pieces of land which, being less than half an acre, the company were bound by the act of parliament to purchase. The schedule of claims has nothing to do with the notice of appointing the arbitrators, which alone constitutes the submission to arbitration; and the company do not refer in any way to the schedule, nor do they adopt it. The Messrs. Wood had no right to force the company to purchase these small pieces of land.

[PARKE, B.—If the company were to act upon this reference, they would have no account of the amount of land that they had required the landowners to sell.]

It appears from the affidavits that the claimants gave evidence of the value of land not referred to or included in the company's submission to arbitration, and that such evidence was objected to by the company on the ground that the umpire had no authority to award upon any matter or thing not mentioned in such appointment or submission.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think this rule must be discharged, but without costs.

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion; the award is clearly bad, and cannot be enforced. Nothing has been referred but the value of the land required by the company to be taken. Whether the award may not be sustained by reference to the conduct of the parties is another matter. It certainly cannot be supported on these submissions.

ROLFE, B. and PLATT, B. concurred.

Limitations, Statute of—Payment of Interest—Admission in Writing—Construction.

In an action for money lent the defendant pleaded the Statute of Limitations; and at the trial the plaintiff proved the transmission of the money to the defendant, and the payment by him of a half-yearly sum for interest up to a certain time, and produced an answer to a bill in Chancery, in which the defendant admitted having paid the same half-yearly sum within six years, but asserted that it was paid by way of annuity, and not of interest. Assuming that an acknowledgment of a payment must be in writing, and signed, under the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. s. 1, in order to bar the operation of the Statute of Limitations,—Held, that the evidence for the plaintiff was sufficient to go to the jury. That the construction of the admission in the answer was for the Court, and that the whole of it should have been left to the jury; but that they might believe the fact of the payments having been made half-yearly, but reject the residue, and infer from the other evidence that the payments were really made in respect of interest.

Words used at the time of making a payment qualify it; but it is for the jury to judge of the truth of a statement accompanying the admission of a previous payment.

Assumpsit, by the plaintiff, as executor of Elizabeth Craven, deceased.

The first three counts of the declaration were for 500*l.*, for money lent by the testatrix to the defendant, for interest due from the defendant to the testatrix, and for money found to be due from the defendant to the testatrix on an account stated between them, and they alleged promises made by the defendant to the testatrix in her lifetime.

The fourth, fifth, and sixth counts were similar, but alleged the promises to have been made by the defendant to the plaintiff as executor, after the testatrix's decease.

The seventh count was upon an account stated between the defendant and the plaintiff, as executor, after the decease of the testatrix.

Pleas—First, non assumpsit; second, the Statute of Limitations.

The cause was tried, at the sittings in Middlesex, after Michaelmas term, 1844, before Pollock, C.B.; and by his direction the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with 340*l.* damages. Leave was reserved to the plaintiff to move to increase the damages, by adding the interest which had accrued since the testatrix's death; and leave was also given to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit. Rules nisi having been accordingly obtained, both of them came on for argument before the Court of Exchequer on the 24th of May 1845; and it was ultimately agreed by the counsel that a bill of exceptions should be tendered by the plaintiff upon the evidence adduced by him at the trial of the cause, and upon such summing up as would raise the question in dispute, under the plea of the Statute of Limitations, as if it had been done at the trial.

A bill of exceptions was accordingly tendered, which contained allegations to the following effect:—It was proved, at the trial, that the testatrix, Elizabeth Craven, died on the 19th of June 1843; that in the year 1817 the defendant wrote her a letter which contained these words: "I forgot to say I should allow you 5*l.* per cent. for the money, and, perhaps in my next, I shall send you proposals as to sinking it if you wish." On the 14th of December 1817, the defendant wrote to Miss Craven in these terms:—"Dear Miss Craven, I have received the parcel, and suppose all is right, but have not had time to look them over. The former parcel of half bills were for 235*l.* I will acknowledge the whole amount when I next write to you, and at which time I shall send you my proposals." On the 2nd of December 1818, the defendant wrote to Miss Craven, as follows: "I shall not say anything about your uncle and the money now; you might easily have evaded the question. However, when I see you, I will make an arrangement respecting it. On the other half of this letter I send you a statement as a memorandum which you can cut off. It is up to Midsummer day, so your interest will now be due again very soon, and the interest up to that time, as near as I could calculate, was 8*l.* I have put 2*l.* to the interest, which will now make the whole 300*l.*, so you will now have to receive 7*l.* 10*s.* at Midsummer and Christmas, which will be 5*l.* per cent., or 15*l.* per year." The memorandum accompanying the letter was as follows:—

On the 21st of June 1819, the defendant sent Miss Craven an acknowledgment for 20*l.*, and on the 27th of August in the same year another for 20*l.* more. In several subsequent letters addressed by the defendant to Miss Craven, he referred to the interest which he owed her, as amounting to 8*l.* 10*s.* half-yearly. In the year 1843 the plaintiff filed a bill in the Court of Chancery against the defendant, charging that the defendant had borrowed money of the testatrix amounting to 340*l.*, and had paid 5*l.* per cent. interest for it half-yearly down to the 25th of December 1842. The defendant, in his answer, denied that he had borrowed the money from the plaintiff's testatrix, and alleged that she had presented him with sums amounting together to 340*l.*, and that he had paid her 5*l.* per cent. upon that sum, by way of annuity, and not by way of interest, and transmitted the sum of 8*l.* 10*s.* periodically as a half-yearly payment, down to Christmas 1842.

The counsel for the plaintiff insisted that this evidence was sufficient to entitle the jury to find for the plaintiff on the first issue as to the last four counts of the declaration, and on the issue of the Statute of Limitations.

The learned Judge ruled that the evidence was not sufficient for that purpose, and directed the jury to find for the defendant on the first issue as to the last four counts, and on the second issue, which they did accordingly.*

Ellis, for the plaintiff in error (6th Feb. 1847) (1).—There was sufficient evidence of the original debt to go to the jury, and that the payments which the defendant acknowledged by his answer to have been made by him within six years were payments by way of interest for a debt, al-

* This was the statement in the bill of exceptions agreed upon between the parties on the argument in the Court of Exchequer, but the Chief Baron said he would have ruled the other way. Willis v. Newham was relied on for the defendant, but the counsel for the plaintiff denied its applicability.

(1) Before Wilde, C.J., Patteson, J., Coleridge, J., Wightman, J., Cresswell, J., Erle, J., and Williams, J.

though he denied in the answer that they were made on that account. The general proposition applicable to the case is, that the payment of interest within six years is evidence of a new contract between the parties. The plaintiff relies upon the payment itself, and not upon the acknowledgment contained in the answer to the bill in Chancery. That answer admits that money was transmitted periodically by the defendant to the deceased, but avers that it was not paid as interest upon a debt. Willis v. Newham (2) decides that if you seek to establish the fact of payment by means of an acknowledgment, that acknowledgment must, under the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. s. 1, be in writing and signed by the party; but it does not decide that an acknowledgment is the only means by which the payment may be proved. Here the answer is not used as an acknowledgment of the kind of payment which is required to defeat the Statute of Limitations, but simply to prove the fact of the transmission of the money from the one party to the other, extrinsic evidence being relied upon to shew that such transmission was a payment of interest in respect of a debt. In the notes to Hodsdon v. Harridge (3) it is laid down, that when once the fact of payment has been proved, parol admissions of the defendant may be received to shew upon what account the payment was made. The effect of payment to bar the operation of the statute is so stringent, that a payment by one of three co-contractors in fraud of the other two, has been held sufficient to bind them all—Goddard v. Ingram (4). The first step in the extrinsic evidence was to prove the original debt. The defendant's letters admitting the receipt of monies from time to time, and the periodical payments in respect of the money received, were sufficient evidence for the jury of the original debt. Some of the half-yearly payments of 8*l.* 10*s.* were expressed to be for interest, and surely the jury might infer that subsequent payments of the same sum were made on the same account. It may be said that no acknowledgment was proved; but the payment itself was the acknowledgment of the debt. An acknowledgment used as such derives its whole value from the fact that it comes from the defendant; but the evidence of a third person is admissible to prove payment. The fact of payment having once been established, the appropriation of the payment may be proved by any medium of proof—Waters v. Tompkins (5); confirmed in Edan v. Dudsfield (6), where the former case is applied analogically to the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds. In Bayley v. Ashton (7), Patteson, J. said, "If payment is proved without a word spoken, it will be enough, provided the appropriation is shewn; and this may be done by a parol admission, according to Waters v. Tompkins." These cases, then, justify the division of the proof of payment for the purposes of the statute into two elements, namely, transmission and appropriation. The case of Willis v. Newham is different in this respect from the present, for there the whole evidence was a statement by the party. The rule laid down in Willis v. Newham does not follow from the words of Lord Tenterden's act. As to the mischief contemplated by the act, that was supposed to arise from the liability of parties to misunderstand statements which they hear, and applies not to the fact of handing over money, but to the reason for handing it over. Yet in both Waters v. Tompkins and Bayley v. Ashton it was held, that the appropriation of payments might be proved by parol. In order to prove the new contract created by payment or acknowledgment, it is competent to shew either an acknowledgment of the debt or a payment in respect of it, or an admission of such acknowledgment, or an admission of such payment.

[WILDE, C.J.—There is a case in which it was held, that parol evidence of a written promise to pay a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations was admissible on proof that the document had been lost.]

That was the case of Haydon v. Williams (8). In this case the admission of payment corresponds with the secondary evidence of the written acknowledgment. But even if the original acknowledgment were not lost, why should not an oral admission by the party be evidence? The statute prohibits an oral admission of the debt itself, not an oral admission that the statutory provisions had been complied with. The Judges are most anxious that the decision in Willis v. Newham should be reviewed. The principal cases in which it has been acted upon are Bayley v. Ashton, Maghee v. O'Neil (9), and Eastwood v. Saville (10).

Peacock, for the defendant in error.—It is contended for the plaintiff, that the answer in Chancery is to be taken, like any other admission, to prove the fact of payment, and that the jury may reject one portion of it and adopt another; but for the defendant it is submitted, that the answer must be taken as an acknowledgment under the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. s. 1, in which case the construction of the document is for the Court, and not for the jury—Morrall v. Frith (11), Bucket v. Church (12). It has been distinctly established that the statute 9 Geo. 4. was not intended to alter the effect of an acknowledgment; and, therefore, an acknowledgment from which a promise to pay cannot be inferred will not defeat the Statute of Limitations. The effect of a payment is very different from the effect of an acknowledgment: for a payment by one of several co-contractors operates as a promise by all, whereas an acknowledgment by one of several binds him only who has signed it—Burleigh v. Stott (13), Wyatt v. Hodson (14). The case of Willis v. Newham decides that a verbal acknowledgment of the part payment of a debt is not sufficient to bar the operation of the Statute of Limitations, and that case was supported by the recent case of Clark v. Alexander (15). If the argument on the other side is correct, admission of payment by one partner will be sufficient to bind his co-partners, whereas the statute says that no acknowledgment shall have effect against any party unless it be in writing and signed by him. If the acknowledgment of payment be accompanied by a statement which would prevent the presumption of a promise to pay, surely it cannot suffice to defeat the Statute of Limitations. A payment to be within the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14, must be made as payment of part or of interest in respect of a debt due—Tippett v. Heane (16), and the promise to pay must be absolute and not conditional—Tanner v. Smart (17). The question here is, whether the acknowledgment of the payment of interest is to be proved by a writing; and if it be, then the writing is to be construed by the Court. No case has been cited to shew that a verbal acknowledgment by a party himself, that he has paid interest, is sufficient to take the case out of the statute. In Goddard v. Ingram the payment was proved by direct evidence of the fact, not by an admission. In Waters v. Tompkins the acknowledgment was coupled with a fact, and there was evidence of the fact of a debt without the admission of the party. Here the statement in the answer is either a written acknowledgment to be construed by the Court, or merely a verbal admission, and then part of it only should not have been left to the jury, but the whole qualified admission.

Ellis, in reply.—The argument on the other side has proceeded on the supposition that the answer was relied upon as an acknowledgment of the debt; but that is not so. If it had been used as an acknowledgment, no doubt one part could not have been taken, and another rejected; but it was used only as evidence of a previous fact. The document was divisible, and the two elements might be separated. In Ross v. Savory (18) an account was not held to be so conclusive on a party but that an item in it might be shewn to be incorrect, and the separability of the statement of charge and discharge was admitted. Clark v. Alexander, which has been cited in support of Willis v. Newham, was one of that class of cases in which the party has failed on evidence derived from the document alone. An acknowledgment under the statute certainly does not bind a co-contractor; but why should not an admission, which is not an acknowledgment, have the same effect in this case as well as in any others? The payment of a smaller sum in respect of a larger is evidence that something more is due—Burn v. Boulton (19), per Maule, J.; and the qualifications of the payment sought to be introduced here are statements made long after the payment relied on. It may be that evidence of payment should not be admitted without the words accompanying it, but the qualifying statements here did not accompany the payment.

WILDE, C.J. (Dec. 2, 1847) delivered the judgment of the Court.—This was an action brought by Francis Baidon, as executor of Elizabeth Craven, against Thomas Wedgwood Walton, for money lent by the testatrix to the defendant, for interest, and for money due on an account stated with the testatrix, laying the promise to pay to the testatrix. There was a similar set of counts on promises to the executor, and a count on an account stated with the executor. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and that the cause of action did not accrue within six years. The case was tried, before the Lord Chief Baron at the Sittings in Middlesex, after Michaelmas term, 1844, when a bill of exceptions was tendered to the direction of the learned Judge, which bill states that the counsel for the plaintiff gave legal and sufficient evidence in support of the affirmative of the issue first joined, so far as the same relates to the first three counts. It then proceeds to state certain letters and other documents written by the defendant, and sent by him to the testatrix.—[His Lordship stated them.]—The bill of exceptions then sets out a bill in equity, exhibited by the plaintiff against the defendant, and his answer. The bill charged that the defendant borrowed of Elizabeth Craven, at different times, money amounting in the whole to 340*l.*, and that he paid interest for it at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, by half-yearly payments, down to the 25th of December 1842, and that Elizabeth Craven died on the 13th of June 1843. The defendant, by his answer, denied that he had ever borrowed any money of Elizabeth Craven; but stated that she had, at different times, made him presents of money amounting in the whole to 340*l.* and that he had paid to her, half-yearly, 5*l.* per cent. on that sum, not as interest, but as an annuity in consideration of her having given him the money, and that the last of such payments was made on the 25th of December 1842. It was insisted for the plaintiff that this evidence was sufficient to entitle the jury (if they should think fit) to find a verdict for the plaintiff on the first issue, as far as it related to the last four counts, and on the issue secondly joined. The learned Judge ruled that it was not sufficient for that purpose, and directed the jury as to the last four counts and as to the issue on the Statute of Limitations, to find a verdict for the defendant, whereupon a bill of exceptions was tendered.* The case was argued, after last Hilary term, by Mr. T. F. Ellis, for the plaintiff in error, who contended that there was sufficient evidence (as stated in the bill of exceptions) of an original debt from the defendant to the testatrix, and of payment of 8*l.* 10*s.* half-yearly for interest down to a certain period, and that the only fact to be supplied was the continuance of such payments within six years; that the defendant's answer in writing, and signed by him, admitted the payments of 8*l.* 10*s.* half-yearly down to the 25th of December 1842; and although in that answer he added that the payments were not made for interest on a debt, and that no debt ever existed, the jury were at liberty to reject the latter part, and find from the other evidence that the payments were made for interest on a debt.

On the other hand, it was contended by Mr. Peacock, for the defendant in error, that the jury could not reject any part of the statement in the answer, for that the statute, 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. says, that "no acknowledgment by words only should be deemed sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, unless such acknowledgment or promise shall be made or contained by or in some writing, to be signed by the party chargeable thereby;" which words apply as well to an acknowledgment of a payment as to an acknowledgment of a debt; and therefore, as the acknowledgment must be in writing, nothing could be added to it by parol, and the Court must construe it altogether as written by the defendant; and if so construed, the answer did not admit a payment in discharge of interest on a debt, but expressly denied it.

In the course of the argument many observations were made, on the one side and the other, upon the case of Willis v. Newham, in which it was held that a verbal acknowledgment of part payment of a debt within six years would not, after the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14, be an answer to a plea of the Statute of Limitations; but it seems to us quite unnecessary to express any opinion on that point. In reality there is no question here upon the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. The defendant has made no admission by words only, not contained in a writing signed by him. Whatever admission he has made was made in writing, signed and sworn to by him; and the true question is, what did he admit by that writing? For the purpose of this argument, it may be assumed that the acknowledgment of a payment as well as any other acknowledgment must be in writing signed by the party; and we agree with Mr. Peacock, that the written admission by the defendant must be construed by the Court; and we think that the plain meaning of it is, that the defendant admits having paid 8*l.* 10*s.*, half-yearly, to Elizabeth Craven down to December 1842, but asserts that such payment was made by way of annuity, and not as interest on a debt. We also agree with Mr. Peacock that the whole admission must be laid before the jury as one entire writing; but we are also of opinion that the jury were not bound to believe the whole of it: they might believe the fact of 8*l.* 10*s.* being paid half-yearly, but reject the residue, and infer from the other evidence in the case that the payments were made for interest upon a debt. If the admission had been made merely that the defendant had paid the sum of 8*l.* 10*s.* half-yearly, without adding that it was appropriated to any particular account, there can be no doubt that the jury might have inferred from the evidence that a debt existed, and that interest was paid down to a certain period; and that the subsequent payments admitted to have been made were also for interest. In Waters v. Tompkins it was held, that where the fact of payment of a sum of money is proved, the appropriation of it may be shewn by other evidence, even by a verbal statement. Here the fact of payment was proved by an admission in writing, and of the appropriation there was sufficient evidence to be left to the jury. The only question is, whether the assertion of the defendant respecting the appropriation was conclusive. If the payments had been accompanied by that assertion they would have been qualified by it, and could not have been treated as payments of interest on a debt; but here there is an admission of a bygone act, viz., payment, and an assertion respecting it, which may or may not be true. It is no part of the act, but only what the defendant chooses to say respecting it. We think, therefore, that although that assertion must be admitted as evidence, the jury ought to have been allowed to contrast it with the other evidence in the case, and to decide whether the payments admitted were for interest or not; and inasmuch as that other evidence was withdrawn from their consideration, and they were directed to find for the defendant, there must be a verdict de novo.

The 26th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. disables an attorney, who is uncertificated, only from suing for fees, rewards, and disbursements, for any business, matter, or thing done by him as an attorney or solicitor, in some suit or proceeding in one of the courts mentioned in the act, and not for business done which had no reference to such suits or proceedings.

* It was agreed between the counsel when the bill of exceptions was agreed upon, that if the Exchequer Chamber should direct a verdict de novo the plaintiff should have final judgment forthwith.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff for the work, labour, care, diligence, journeys and attendances of the plaintiff by him done, performed, and bestowed as the attorney and solicitor of and for the defendant, and at his request, and for fees due and of right payable to the plaintiff in respect thereof, &c. The second count was for other work and labour, and the third, for money paid.

Plea to these three counts, that the plaintiff under and by virtue of the said first, second, and third counts claims and seeks to recover against the defendant certain fees, rewards, and disbursements for and in respect of certain business, matters, and things theretofore done by the plaintiff as an attorney and solicitor for him, the defendant; that at the time the said business, matters, and things were done by the plaintiff as aforesaid, to wit, &c., the plaintiff, as such attorney and solicitor as aforesaid, did then carry on certain proceedings, to wit, conduct and manage a certain cause in which J. G. was plaintiff, and the now defendant was defendant, in the Court of Exchequer at Westminster, without having previously obtained or then having a stamped certificate then in force, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided; and that the said business, matters, and things for the recovery of the fees, rewards, and disbursements in respect of which this action is brought, and each and any of them, were and was done by the plaintiff as such attorney and solicitor as aforesaid, whilst he was without such certificate, &c. Verification.

Special demurrer, assigning for cause (amongst others) that it did not appear that the business, matters, and things done by the plaintiff as an attorney and solicitor, in respect of which the fees, rewards, and disbursements in the said first, second, and third counts are alleged to be claimed, were done by the plaintiff in and about suing, prosecuting, defending, or carrying on any action or suit or any proceeding in any of the courts in the statute, in such case made, mentioned.

Hurlstone to support the plea.—The chief question in this case turns upon the construction which the Court will be disposed to put upon the 26th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. (1). The plea follows the words of that section according to their literal construction. The words "attorney and solicitor as aforesaid" mean an attorney or solicitor who, having neglected to take out his certificate, nevertheless had done business in a proceeding in a court of law or equity, and the penalty which by that section attaches upon a party guilty of such neglect is a disqualification to sue, not only in respect of the business done by him in a proceeding in a court of law or equity, but in respect of any business whatsoever done by him as an attorney or solicitor. The words "any business" done by such attorney or solicitor occur also in the 37th section of the statute; and it is plain from the whole of that section that the word "business" is intended to include, not only business done in a court of law or equity, but also all other business done by a party as attorney or solicitor. When, as in the 35th and 36th sections of the same statute, the legislature intend to put a limit upon the incapacity to sue, they use words which express their intention. He referred also to 25 Geo. 3. c. 80. ss. 1, 3, 7; 37 Geo. 3. c. 80. s. 31; and to Willon v. Chambers (2).

Temple, in reply.—The greatest inconvenience would result from adopting the construction contended for by the other side. It would embrace business done by any person under a power of attorney, or as the solicitor of a bill in parliament, and in many other ways in which the person doing the business need not have been admitted as an attorney or solicitor in any of the courts of law or equity. An attorney might have a very good claim against his client recoverable upon one day; but if on the following he were to do business in any

(1) Section 26. enacts "that no person who as an attorney or solicitor shall sue, prosecute, defend, or carry on any action or suit or any proceedings in any of the courts aforesaid, without having previously obtained a stamped certificate which shall be then in force, shall be capable of maintaining any action or suit at law or in equity for the recovery of any fee, reward, or disbursement for or in respect of any business, matter, or thing done by him as an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid whilst he shall have been without such certificate as last aforesaid."

(2) 7 Ad. & El. 524; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 13.

proceeding in any of the courts for some other individual, his claim against his first client is to be barred. Such is not the construction to be put upon the words of the 26th section; and when reference is also made to the 1st and 2nd sections of the statute, it becomes quite clear that when the legislature made use of the words "attorney or solicitor as aforesaid" they intended that the incapacity to sue was not to be in respect of all business of whatever kind transacted by him as attorney or solicitor, but only in respect of business in any suit or proceeding in any court of law or equity.

PARKE, B. now (July 11) delivered the judgment of the Court (3).—The principal objection to this plea on the argument of the demurrer was, that it does not appear by it that the action was brought for fees, rewards, and disbursements within the meaning of the 26th section of the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73; the plaintiff's counsel contending that this disables an attorney who is uncertificated only from suing for fees, rewards, or disbursements for any business, matter, or thing done by him as an attorney or solicitor in some suit or proceeding in one of the courts mentioned in the act, and not for business done which had no reference to such suits or proceedings; and we are of that opinion. The 26th section provides that "no person who, as an attorney or solicitor, shall sue, prosecute, defend, or carry on any action or suit, or any proceedings in any of the courts aforesaid, without having previously obtained a stamped certificate which shall be then in force, shall be capable of maintaining any action or suit at law or in equity for the recovery of any fee, reward, or disbursement for or in respect of any business, matter or thing done by him as an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid whilst he shall have been without such certificate as last aforesaid." The question is, what meaning we are to attribute to the words of reference in the expression "as an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid." We think they must necessarily refer either to an attorney or solicitor acting as described in the commencement of that section, or to the previous description of an attorney or solicitor in the 2nd section; and, in the former case, the disability will be confined to suits for fees, &c. due for business done as an attorney in suing, prosecuting, defending, or carrying on any action or suit or any proceedings in any of the courts aforesaid; in the latter for fees due to any attorney, &c., acting as such in, or suing out any writ or process, or commencing, carrying on, soliciting, or defending any action, suit, or other proceeding in the name of any other person or in his own name in any of the courts mentioned in the 2nd section, including proceedings before one or more Justices; so that it really makes no difference whether the words "as aforesaid" relate to the beginning of the 26th section or to the 2nd. For one or the other they certainly do refer, and in either the disability to sue is confined to fees, &c., connected with a suit.

It was, however, argued, in support of the plea, that the difference of the language of the legislature in the 35th and 36th sections from that in the 26th indicated a different intention in the legislature.

The 35th section provides, that if any person not admitted and enrolled sues out any writ or process or defends an action, he shall be incapable of maintaining an action for any fees, &c. on account of prosecuting, carrying on, or defending any such action, suit or proceeding, or otherwise in relation thereto; and a similar provision is made by the 36th section, if any person shall commence, or carry on, or defend any action in the county court. The language being more general in the 26th section, it was contended that the restriction in that section was meant to be more extensive.

It appears to us that the words of reference "as an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid," confine the disability to the same class of fees, rewards, and disbursements as those pointed out expressly in the 35th and 36th sections. This being so, the plea is in our opinion defective, in not averring that the fees, &c. were due to the plaintiff as an attorney in prosecuting or defending a suit or proceeding in a court. They are not even stated to be due to him as an attorney at law, and they might be payable to him as an attorney acting before arbitrators or a compensation jury, or transacting business under a power of attorney for the defendant.

F. afterwards petitioned the Court of Bankruptcy for his discharge under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. and the 7 & 8 Vict. v. 96, and having obtained from the Commissioner an order for his discharge, he was discharged by the defendant accordingly. PATTESON, J.—It is not necessary to decide the first point in this case, viz. whether the learned Commissioner had power by his interim order to discharge Foulkes from the judgment, at the suit of Thomas, the present plaintiff, which depends on the proper construction to be given to the 6th section of the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, inasmuch as we are all of opinion, on the second point, that, whether the commissioner was right or wrong, he had such jurisdiction in the matter as to distinguish this case from the Marshalsea case (3), and others of the same class; and that the judgment of the Court below, on this second point, is quite right, both in its result and in the reasons given for it, with which we entirely agree. The judgment must, therefore, be affirmed.

An account was then stated between the plaintiff and the defendant, charging the defendant with the full amount of the principal and interest, and giving him credit for the net proceeds of the sale. the plaintiff lent the defendant the sum of 350*l.*, which was secured by an assignment, by way of mortgage, of leasehold property, with a power of sale, and collaterally by the defendant's bond given to the plaintiff. In June 1847 the plaintiff sold the property, and rendered an account to the defendant, who admitted the correctness thereof. This account shewed a deficiency to the extent of 128*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.*, which balance the defendant promised to pay, and to recover which the present action was brought. For the defendant, it was contended, on the authority of 1 Roll. Abr. p. 9, pl. 11. and *Petch v. The judgment of the Court was now delivered by—

ROLFE, B.—This case was tried, before my Brother Platt last Michaelmas term, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to leave reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, if the Court should be of opinion that, under the circumstances of the case, an action of debt on an account stated would not lie. A rule nisi for entering a nonsuit having been granted pursuant to this leave, the same was argued last term, before the Chief Baron and my Brothers Alderson, Platt, and myself. The plaintiff was mortgagee under a mortgage from the defendant, with a power of sale, and the mortgage deed contained the ordinary covenant by the defendant to pay the principal sum secured, with interest. The mortgaged property was afterwards sold by the plaintiff under the power, but it did not produce sufficient to discharge the debt due to the plaintiff. A meeting afterwards took place between the plaintiff and the defendant, when an account was stated between them, charging the defendant with the full amount of principal and interest, and giving him credit for the net proceeds of the sale. It may be taken that the defendant admitted the balance on this account to be correctly ascertained, and that he promised to pay it. The verdict was for this balance; and the only question is, whether on this state of facts, an action of debt on an account stated can be maintained; and we think it cannot. The general principle is clear, that where a debt is secured by a bond, covenant, or other specialty, there the obligation by simple contract is gone. The lesser security is merged in the greater. But the plaintiff contended that that doctrine does not apply in the present case, for although the original debt was secured by a covenant, yet that here there was a subsequent statement of accounts, and so that the defendant on that occasion made himself liable by a new contract to pay the balance remaining due, and in support of this proposition he relied on the case of Foster v. Allanson. In that case the plaintiff and the defendant had entered into articles of partnership under seal for seven years, and they covenanted with each other to adjust and make a final settlement at the end of the partnership, and then to divide the stock and profits equally between them. Before the expiration of the seven years they agreed to dissolve the partnership, and they came to a settling of accounts, in which were included several items not relating to the partnership. A balance was found to be due on this settling to the plaintiff; and it was held that notwithstanding the specialty the plaintiff might recover that balance in an action of assumpsit on an account stated. But the judgment of Ashurst, J. goes expressly on the ground that this was a new transaction, and that the account was stated of other matters besides the items due under the deed; and although Buller, J. says that, even if no other articles had been introduced, he should have been of opinion that assumpsit would lie, yet that opinion was founded on the circumstances, that the dissolution of the partnership and subsequent settling of accounts constituted in point of law a good consideration for a new promise. Now, in the present case, none of the circumstances relied on in Foster v. Allanson are to be found. The defendant is charged with nothing but the money secured by the deed; there is no consideration for the suggested new liability, except the ascertaining how much remains due on the deed. It is a perversion of language to speak of this as an account stated: it is merely a process adopted for the purpose of ascertaining how much of the original debt has been discharged; and all which is really done is to make out to what extent the defendant remains liable upon the deed. This does not entitle the plaintiff to proceed as on a new liability arising from an account stated, and so the rule for a nonsuit must be made absolute.

The declaration stated that by indenture the plaintiff conveyed all the coals and mines of coal within and under certain premises to the defendant, and the defendant covenanted to pay 40l. for every statute acre of coal which should be found; and that he would, till the consideration money should be paid, pay the sum of 40l. part, &c. annually by half-yearly instalments, commencing from the date of the indenture, whether a whole acre should have been gotten in any such year or not. It was then averred that at the time of making the indenture there had been, and still was, coal within and under the premises, and that two half-yearly instalments were in arrear:—Held, reversing the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, that the declaration was good, and that the finding of coal was not a condition precedent to the payment.

Error from the Court of Exchequer.

Covenant. The declaration stated that by an indenture the plaintiff bargained, sold, aliened, and released to J. S. and the defendant all the coals, mines, &c. of coal lying within and under a certain messuage and lands, with the privilege of winning and carrying away the said coal; that the defendant covenanted to pay to the plaintiff as the price or consideration money of the said coal the sum of 40l. for every statute acre of the said coal which should be found within or under the said messuage and lands, and would, until the said consideration money should be paid, pay to the plaintiff the sum of 40l., part of the said consideration money in each year by two equal payments on the 3rd of January and the 3rd of July, whether the whole of an acre in any such year should be gotten or not. It was then averred, that at the making of the said indenture, there were within and under the said messuage and lands divers (to wit) fourteen acres of coal, and that thirteen acres of the said coal still remained within and under the said premises, and that the sum of 40l. for two of the said half-yearly instalments of the price and consideration money of the said coal became and was due and was in arrear to the plaintiff.

At the trial, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, and the Court of Exchequer subsequently made a rule absolute to arrest the judgment, on the ground that the declaration was bad, for not shewing that coal had been found, the finding of coal being held to be a condition precedent to the obligation to pay—see the report, ante, vol. 15, (N.S.) Exch. 347. The plaintiff thereupon brought his writ of error.

Hugh Hill (June 18, 1847) for the plaintiff in error.—The first question in the case is whether, according to the true construction of the instrument set out in the declaration, it was necessary that coals should actually be found in order to entitle the plaintiff to payment. The rule of construction applicable to the case is thus laid down by Tindal, C.J., in Stavers v. Curling (1). The question whether covenants are to be held dependent or independent of each other, is to be determined by the intention and meaning of the parties as it appears on the instrument and by the application of common sense to each particular case. In this case the instrument was not a licence to mine, but a grant of coals for a certain consideration. The extent of the consideration money and the times of payment were definitely fixed, and the yearly payment was to be made without reference to the fact, “whether in any such year an acre of coal had been gotten or not.” How could effect be given to these last words if the finding of the coal were to be held a condition precedent to the payment? It was in the option of the grantee to work the mines or not. According to the doctrine in Aspin v. Austin (2), which has been followed in subsequent cases, a covenant by the defendant to work the mines within a reasonable time cannot be implied. The rule which establishes that where a party covenants to pay money on a day which may happen before the consideration is to be performed, the performance is not a condition precedent, is laid down, and the cases illustrating it are cited, in the notes to Porlage v. Cole (3).

The case of Hall v. Bainbridge (4) was similar to the present. There the plaintiff granted the defendant leave to use the principle of a patent in the manufacture and use of steam-engines, and the defendant agreed to pay two sums of 1000*l.* each on fixed days, and 5*l.* per horse power for every engine afterwards to be made; and it was held, that the use of the principle was not a condition precedent to the payment of the money. If in fact all the coals found had been paid for, it was for the defendant to shew that to be the case. The declaration shewed that coal still remained ungotten on the premises, and alleged that two of the half-yearly instalments had become due, which could not be true if all the coals had been paid for. Supposing the finding of coal to be a condition precedent, and that it was necessary to shew in the declaration that coal had been found, the declaration is still supported after verdict by the allegation that the instalments were due and in arrear, and the jury must be taken to have been satisfied that coals had been found. The Court below cited the case of Sicklemore v. Thistleton (5) as similar to the present, but the two cases are distinguishable. The action there was against a surety, who was liable on demand in case his principal should neglect to pay the rent for forty days, and there was nothing in the breach to shew that the rent had been in arrear for forty days, or had been demanded from the defendant, and Lord Ellenborough put the case as one of a qualified covenant, on default of the principal. Here the defendant was primarily liable. If the words of the declaration are ambiguous, and may be construed so as to support it, the Court will, according to the well-known rule, give them that construction after verdict—1 Wms. Saund. 228 d., Lord Huntington v. Gardiner (6), Fletcher v. Pogson (7), Hobson v. Middleton (8), Boydell v. Harrison, per Maule, J. (9). assessed the damages according to the facts; have found for the whole amount; and it must therefore be assumed that the jury were satisfied that coals had been found.

Asherton, for the defendant in error.—The law cited on the other side is good, but inapplicable to this case. It is assumed that this is a grant of mines, as distinguished from a licence to mine; but no feoffment or lease for a year appears on the record; and there is in fact nothing more than a liberty to mine granted. The first point is on the construction of the covenant. According to the ordinary rules of construction, the finding of the coal must be taken to be a condition precedent to the payment of the price. The relation between the parties was not that of lessor and lessee, but that of vendor and purchaser. There are two branches of the covenant, the former of which is to pay the price of the coal, and the latter, which is a subordinate one, points out means for effectuating the former. The bargain was to pay a certain fixed price for the coal found, i. e. ascertained to exist in the premises, and to pay a certain annual amount half-yearly, until the consideration for all the coals found should be fully paid, whether in the course of the year an acre of coal should have been gotten or not. There is an evident distinction on the face of the contract between "gotten" and "found." The meaning of the agreement was, that at the time it was made no steps had been taken to ascertain the quantity of coal lying within and under the premises, but it was the intention of the parties that the quantity should determine the price. They evidently intended that measures should be taken within a reasonable time to ascertain the quantity, so that the gross value should be known, and then that the defendant should go on paying the yearly sum of 40*l.* in half-yearly payments till the whole value had been paid. The half-yearly payment is part of a larger sum, which was to be ascertained before the plaintiff was entitled to anything, and the instalments are distinctly agreed to be parts of the price or consideration money. Supposing the finding of the coal to be a condition precedent, there is no averment contained in the declaration, which will support it after verdict. If the words in the breach alleging that the instalments were "due and in arrear to the plaintiff" be relied upon, they are not sufficient; for coupling the breach with the rest of the pleading, it only amounts to a denial of payment under the circumstances before disclosed. The reason why a pleading is helped by verdict is, that although there may be some defective statement in it, yet it would be unreasonable to suppose that the jury, under the direction of the Judge, would have found their verdict without being satisfied as to the facts defectively stated, but involved in the averment. It is therefore important to look at the issues; and here there does not appear to have been any means of raising the question, whether coal had been found. It is said that the defendant cannot take the objection that no coal was found, because he has pleaded ever without traversing. But it was not open to the defendant to traverse that the instalments were due, that being rather a conclusion of law than of fact; and if he had traversed the averment in the declaration, he could only have put the plaintiff to prove the existence of coal, not that coal had been found. If the declaration be good, the liability of the defendant may go on as long as any coal exists, whether it be worth winning or not. The case of Sicklemore v. Thistleton, relied on in the court below, is directly in favour of the defendant.

LORD DENMAN, C.J. (June 6th, 1848,) delivered the judgment of the Court (9).—This is an action of covenant on an indenture, whereby the plaintiff conveys to the defendant and his heirs all the coal lying and being within and under certain premises, and the defendant covenants to pay 40*l.* for every statute acre of coal which should be found within or under the premises, and until the said price or consideration for the said coal should be fully paid, to pay 40*l.* per annum by half-yearly payments, on the 3rd of January and the 3rd of July, commencing from the date of the indenture (viz. the 2nd of July 1844), whether the whole of an acre of the said coal should in any such year be gotten or not. The declaration avers that at the time of the making of the indenture there was within and under the premises a large quantity, and that a large quantity still remained; but it does not aver that any coals were found or gotten. The question is, whether the finding of coal is a condition precedent to the plaintiff's recovering the annual sum of 40*l.* It appears to us that it is not. The parties seem to have assumed that there were coals within and under the premises, and the indenture operates as an absolute sale and conveyance of that coal to the defendant, but without any covenant on his part to work or get that coal. The words of the conveying part are, "all the coals lying and being within and under the premises." Whether the defendant at any time should think fit to find and get them was left entirely to his will and pleasure. The consideration money is 40*l.* per acre for coals found, not for coals gotten. By the word "found," we apprehend the parties to mean "ascertained to lie and be." It is necessary that the quantity should be ascertained at some time, in order to fix the ultimate amount of the consideration money. That quantity might be found and ascertained without working or getting the coal. Who then is the proper person to find and ascertain the quantity? Not the plaintiff, for he had parted with all his interest in and possession of the coal, but the defendant who has taken them. In order to secure his so finding and ascertaining the quantity, the covenant of the defendant to pay 40*l.* per annum till the consideration money should be fully paid is inserted; otherwise, as there is no covenant to work or get the coal, the quantity might never be ascertained. The right of the plaintiff to sue for the annual sum is absolute and without condition, and if by finding and ascertaining the quantity of the coal, and paying the annual sum stipulated, the defendant has fully paid the consideration money for the purchase of the coal, it is for him to plead those facts. We think then that the plaintiff is entitled to keep his verdict, and that the judgment of the Court below should be reversed.

(9) The Judges present were Lord Denman, C.J., Patteson, J., Coleridge, J., Coltman, J., Maule, J., Cresswell, J., Erle, J., and Williams, J.

*Trespass for breaking and entering the close of the plaintiff. Pleas—first, right of way under the Prescription Act; second, a user of the way for forty years. Replication to the first plea, that the corporation of L. being seised in fee of the locus in quo, demised it to H. for a term of lives and years; that the corporation delivered seisin of the same to H, who became seised of the said term, and that the said term so demised was existing in full force. Replication to the second plea stated, as in the former replication, the seisin and possession of H. for the said term, and that H. being so seised of the locus in quo, and during the continuance of the seisin, by indenture between C. of the first part, H. of the second part, and M. & W. of the third part, granted to M. & W. a right of way over the said close. Rejoinder to first replication traversed the existence of the term during the period of twenty years in the plea mentioned. Rejoinder to second replication, that H. did not grant to M. & W. the right of way modo et formâ. At the trial, it appeared that the corporation of L, being seised in fee of the locus in quo, by indenture of the 17th of February 1800, demised the same to H. for a term of lives and years. By indenture of the 23rd of July 1803, H. assigned to C. his interest in the demised premises, to secure payment of 1,200*l.* lent by C. to H. By indenture of the 9th of February 1804, reciting the two former indentures, and also that H. had agreed to sell part of the land to M. & W. for a sum, out of which the sum due from H. should be paid to C, C. bargained, sold, assigned, and transferred, and H. granted, bargained, sold, assigned, and transferred to M. & W. part of the demised premises, together with the right of way in question. In 1812 H. died, having made his will, whereby, after bequeathing his estates to his wife for life, he devised the same, after her death, to J. & M. in manner following, "upon trust to pay and apply the rents, issues, and profits of the same to and* for the life and benefit of my daughter Mary and her assigns during her life, and independent of her present or any future husband; and from and after the decease of my said daughter, I give, devise, and bequeath my real and leasehold estates as aforesaid, unto and equally among all and every the children of my said daughter Mary, share and share alike, as tenants in common." In 1816 the wife of H. died. By indenture of the 11th of December 1817, the corporation of L. assigned to the trustees the reversion in fee simple of the locus in quo:—Held, that as the trustees took only an estate during the life of Mary, the lease for lives did not merge in the grant of the reversion; secondly, that the rejoinder to the second replication only put in issue the fact of a grant, and that the seisin of H. was admitted.

Trespass. The declaration was for breaking and entering a certain close and yard of the plaintiff, situate in Liverpool, and belonging to a certain dwelling-house of the plaintiff.

The defendant (amongst other pleas) pleaded, thirdly, under the Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71, a private right of way over the said close, enjoyed for twenty years; and, fourthly, a plea of forty years' user.

Replication to the third plea, that before the commencement of the said period of twenty years in the said plea mentioned, and before any user of the said supposed right of way in that plea mentioned, and before and at the time of the making of the indenture next hereinafter mentioned, the mayor, bailiffs, &c. of the borough of Liverpool, &c. were seised in their demesne as of fee, of and in the said close and yard in which, &c., and being so seised, heretofore and before any user of the said supposed right of way in the said plea mentioned, to wit, &c., by a certain indenture then made between the said mayor, bailiffs, &c. of the one part, and Thomas Herbert of the other part, (which said indenture having been lost by lapse of time, the defendant cannot produce to the Court here,) the said mayor, bailiffs, &c. did demise, grant, let, and to farm let to the said Herbert, his executors, &c. the said close and yard in which, &c., to have and to hold the same with the appurtenances unto the said T. Herbert, his executors, &c. for the term of the several and natural life and lives of Mary Herbert, daughter of the said T. Herbert, John Cukit, and J. A. Jee, and the life of the survivor of them, and for the further term of twenty-one years next after such survivor's decease, under the yearly rent, and subject to the covenants and provisoes in the said indenture contained; and the said mayor, bailiffs, &c. then, to wit, on &c. delivered seisin of the said close and yard in which, &c. to the said T. Herbert, by virtue of which said demise the said T. Herbert then became and was seised and possessed of the said close and yard in which, &c., with the appurtenances, for the said term so to him thereof granted as aforesaid. That for and during the whole of the said period of twenty years, in the said plea mentioned, and at the said several times in the said declaration and plea respectively mentioned, the said J. A. Jee, one of the lives mentioned in the said lease, was living, and the said term so demised and granted by the said mayor, bailiffs, &c. of and in the said close and yard in which, &c. was existing in full force and undetermined, and not expired, surrendered, forfeited, or otherwise become void. Verification.

Replication to the fourth plea, after stating the grant to T. Herbert, as in the former replication, went on to aver that T. Herbert, being so seised of the said close and yard in which, &c., and during the continuance of the said demise, to wit, on the 9th of February 1804, &c. by a certain indenture then made between one J. Cukit of the one part, the said T. Herbert of the second part, and T. Morland and J. Williamson of the third part, (which said indenture, being in the possession of the defendant, the plaintiff cannot produce the same to the Court here,) the said T. Herbert did grant unto the said Morland and Williamson, their executors, &c. liberty of ingress, egress, and regress into and out of the said close and yard in which, &c. for and during the residue of the said term by the said last-mentioned indenture created and granted; that during a part of the said period of forty years in the said plea mentioned, to wit, during ten years thereof, the respective occupiers of the said messuages in the said plea mentioned had used and enjoyed the said liberty of ingress, egress, and regress, or right of way for themselves and their servants, to go, return, pass, and repass on foot from the said messuage towards, into, through, over, and along the said close and yard in which, &c., and from thence, &c. at all times of the year, at his and their free will and pleasure, as in the said second plea alleged (being the said liberty of ingress, egress, and regress, or right of way aforesaid) under and by virtue of the said grant thereof, by the said T. Herbert, and not otherwise. Verification.

Rejoinder to the replication to third plea, that the said term so demised and granted by the said mayor, &c. of and in the said close and yard in which, &c. was not so existing in manner and form as in the said replication mentioned for and during the whole or any part of the said period of twenty years in the said third plea mentioned modo et formâ.

Rejoinder to the replication to the fourth plea, that the said T. Herbert did not grant to the said Morland and Williamson, their executors, &c., liberty of ingress, egress and regress into, through, and out of the said close and yard in which, &c. for and during the residue of the said term in the said indenture in the said replication mentioned and granted, modo et formâ.

This cause came on to be tried before Rolfe, B., at the Liverpool Spring Assizes for 1847, when it appeared that by indenture dated the 17th of February 1800, the mayor, bailiffs, &c. of Liverpool being seised in fee demised amongst other premises the (locus in quo) to T. Herbert, for the several lives of M. Herbert, Cukit, and Jee, and the survivor of them, and for twenty-one years after the death of the survivor. Herbert took possession; and by an indenture, dated the 23rd of July 1803, between himself of the first part and Cukit of the other part, reciting the indenture of the 17th of February, 1800, granted, bargained, sold, assigned, transferred, and set over the demised premises to Cukit for the several lives of the said M. Herbert, Cukit, and Jee, and for the life of the survivor, and for the term of twenty-one years from the death of such survivor, upon trust at any time to sell the same for the purpose of securing payment to Cukit of 1,200*l.* lent by Cukit to Herbert, with interest.

On this second indenture, a memorandum of livery of seisin was indorsed, and it was further proved that Herbert had always been in possession of the premises. By a third indenture, dated the 9th of February 1804, between Cukit of the first part, T. Herbert of the second part, and Morland and Williamson of the third part, after reciting the two former indentures, and also reciting that there was then due to Cukit the principal sum of 1,200*l.*, and that T. Herbert, with the consent of Cukit, had come to an agreement with the said Morland and Williamson for the absolute sale and disposal to them of part of the premises so as before mentioned demised to T. Herbert for the sum of 1,500*l.*, out of which sum it had been agreed that the sum of 1,200*l.* should be paid to the said Cukit and the residue to the said T. Herbert, it was witnessed that in consideration of 1,200*l.* paid by the said Morland and Williamson to the said Cukit by and with the direction and consent of the said T. Herbert, testified by his being made a party to and executing those presents, and also in consideration of the sum of 300*l.* by the said Morland and Williamson paid to T. Herbert, he, the said Cukit, at the request and by the direction and appointment of T. Herbert, testified as aforesaid, granted, bargained, sold, assigned, transferred, and set over, and the said T. Herbert granted, bargained, sold, assigned, transferred, and set over, ratified, and confirmed, with the said Morland and Williamson, all that piece or parcel of land, &c. (being part of the premises demised to T. Herbert by the said mentioned indenture), together with liberty of ingress, egress, and regress, in and through a gateway to the front of Wood Street, and a common yard behind the same, &c., to have and to hold the said piece or parcel of land, &c., with the appurtenances, unto the said T. Morland and J. Williamson, their executors, &c., as tenants in common and not as joint tenants, from the day of the date thereof for and during the term of the natural and several life and lives of the said M. Herbert, Cukit, and Jee, and for the life of the survivor of them, and for the further term of twenty-one years next after the death of such survivor.

It also appeared that in the year 1812 T.

Herbert died, having on the 28th of March 1812, duly made his last will and testament, whereby, after bequeathing all his freehold and leasehold estates to his wife for her life, he devised the premises in question as follows:—"And I give, devise, and bequeath all the rest, residue, and remainder of my real and leasehold estates, from and after the decease of my said wife, unto William Field and William Moss, of &c., to hold to them and the survivor of them, his executors, administrators and assigns, according to the respective estates, rights, and interests whereof I may be possessed, of, in and to the same respectively, upon trust to pay and apply the rents, issues, and profits of the same residue and remainder of my real and leasehold estates to and for the use and benefit of my said daughter, Mary Jee, and her assigns, during her life, independent of her present or any her future husband; and from and after the decease of my said daughter, Mary Jee, I give, devise, and bequeath all the said residue and remainder of my real and leasehold estates, as last aforesaid, unto and equally among all and every the children of my said daughter Mary Jee, lawfully to be begotten, share and share alike, to take as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; and if the said Mary Jee shall die without leaving lawful issue her surviving, then I give, devise, and bequeath such residue and remainder as aforesaid unto my granddaughter Mary Ann Shaw, her heirs, executors, &c."

T. Herbert's wife died in the year 1816; and in the following year, by a fourth indenture of the 11th of December 1817, between the mayor, bailiffs, &c. of Liverpool, of the one part, and William Field and William Moss (the trustees named and appointed in and by the will of T. Herbert) of the other part, after reciting the indenture of the 17th of February 1800, also reciting that the said W. Field and W. Moss, as trustees of the said late T. Herbert, were entitled to the said piece of land, &c. for the remainder of the said indenture of lease, and that they had agreed with the said mayor, bailiffs, &c. for the purchase of the reversion and inheritance in fee simple of and in the same, expectant on the determination of the said indenture of lease, it was witnessed, that in consideration of 532*l.* to the said mayor, bailiffs, &c. by the said W. Field and W. Moss paid, the said mayor, bailiffs, &c. granted, bargained, sold, aliened, released, and confirmed unto the said W. Field and W. Moss, as trustees as aforesaid, their heirs and assigns, all that the reversion in fee simple expectant and to take effect in possession immediately from and after the determination of the several estates and terms for lives and years granted by the said recited indenture of lease of and in all that piece or parcel of land, &c., to have and to hold the said reversion in fee simple so expectant as aforesaid, thereby granted and released of and in the said hereditaments and premises, &c., unto the said W. Field and W. Moss, their heirs and assigns, to the only proper use and behoof of them the said W. Field and W. Moss, their heirs and assigns, for ever, to the uses and upon the trusts and to and for the several ends, intents, and purposes mentioned, expressed, and declared in and by the last will and testament of the said T. Herbert, deceased, and for no other use, trust, intent, or purpose whatsoever.

In the year 1820 Mary Jee, the daughter of T. Herbert, died.

On the trial it was contended, by the counsel for the defendant, first, that the issue on the third plea ought to be found for him, inasmuch as the trustees under the will of T. Herbert took an absolute legal estate in the demised premises, and that therefore the lease for lives had merged in the grant of the reversion. The defendant's counsel further contended, that the issue on the fourth plea ought also to be found for the defendant,—first, because at the time of the supposed grant Herbert had no estate in the demised premises, and consequently that the grant could not operate as his grant; and, secondly, that on the face of the instrument itself, considering the recitals, Herbert did not appear to grant the right of way. On the other hand, it was contended, on the part of the plaintiff, as to the issue on the third plea, that the legal estate which the trustees took in the premises was limited to the life of Mary Jee; and as to the issue on the fourth plea it was urged, that the rejoinder admitted the seisin of Herbert, and only put in issue the fact of the grant; and further, that if the seisin was admitted, the indenture shewed on the face of it a grant by Herbert. A verdict was found for defendant on both issues, leave being reserved for the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for him.

Knowles having accordingly obtained a rule,—

Crompton shewed cause (June 22).—As to the third plea the question is, did the lease for lives merge in the grant of the reversion? We shew that Herbert devised to two parties, according to the estate he had. The words of the will are quite large enough to vest the whole legal estate in the trustees, and there is nothing to shew that the primâ facie meaning of the words should not be taken. It would be just as well that the children should take an equitable as a legal interest, and probably better. Then the trustees, having the absolute legal estate, the term granted by the indenture of lease would merge in the subsequent grant of the reversion, and the issue on the third plea be properly found for the defendant. As to the fourth plea the question is, did Herbert grant the right of way? The deed of the 9th of February 1804, which was put in to prove it, shewed a grant by Cukit, and not by Herbert. The whole of this deed must be taken together, and looking at the whole it shews, ex facie, that Herbert had no right to grant. Then a grant without right is absolutely void. This question is properly raised on non concessit. In Baddeley v. Leppingwell (1), Wilmut, J. says, “Non concessit puts the operation of the grant in question”—Taylor v. Needham (2). We traverse here the efficiency of the deed; we do not, therefore, admit the seisin. The law on this subject is laid down in a note to The King v. the Inhabitants of Great Wakering (3), Eden's case (4), Martaine v. Hardy (5). There could be no estoppel here, because the effect appears on the case itself. We could not directly traverse the seisin.

[PARKE, B.—But you might have shewn that it had ceased: must you not, therefore, be taken to admit its continuance?]

Hynde's case (6), Helyer's case (7). The law is laid down in Stephen on Pleading, p. 228. In Cowlishaw v. Cheslyn (8), the argument seems not to have brought the old cases before the Court. That case was an action of trespass qu. cl. fr. The defendant pleaded that A. C. was seised in fee, and being so seised granted a right of way by non-existing grant. The plaintiff replied by traversing the grant. Held, that it was not competent on that issue to shew that A. C. was not seised in fee, for the purpose of rebutting the presumption of the grant; also, in that case, the plaintiff might have traversed that A. C. was seised in fee.

Knowles and Aspinall, contrâ.—First, the leasehold interest did not merge in the grant of the reversion to Herbert's trustees. It cannot be presumed that the trustees did anything except what was necessary to carry out their trusts, which was to collect the rents and profits, and then pass the estate to those who should be entitled. It was never contemplated that there would be an attempt to divide the piece of land into compartments, and give the right of way to the holder of each. The right of way originally granted was appurtenant to the whole. Now they want to divide the premises, and establish a right of way in respect to each division. The words of the will are express: their meaning clearly is, “I give the trustees the estate, to hold during the life of Mary; and at her death I give the same property to be divided amongst the children.” The trust evidently terminates with the life of Mary; and the rule is, that trustees take such an estate only as the nature of the trust requires. Here it is not acquired after the death of Mary.

They certainly could not distrain; but that difficulty is the same in all the cases. There is nothing to distinguish the case of Edwards v. Symons (9) from that before the Court. There A. devised his estate to trustees for the maintenance of his six younger children; and, immediately on the youngest attaining the age of twenty-one, then to his said six children, B, C, &c., and the survivor and survivors of them, their heirs, &c. as tenants in common; and it was held, that B. having died without issue and intestate, after the testator's death, and before the coming of age of the youngest child, had at the time of his death a fee simple estate in reversion in one sixth part—Doe d. Budden v. Harris (10).

[PARKE, B.—He gives the residue to the children in terms as distinct and clear as he gives to the trustees. We all think that, under this will, the estate of the trustees ceases with the life of Mary. The issue on the third plea must, therefore, be found for the plaintiff.]

Then as to the deed of the 9th of February 1804, this clearly operates as the grant of Herbert. If it be critically looked at it will be seen that the word "grant" is only made use of by Herbert. The words used by Cukit are those only of a bargain and sale; and a right of way will not pass by bargain and sale. The deed recites livery of seisin; and the Court can only decide from what appears on the face of the deed. The land to be demised is described to be part of the land demised to Herbert. The words of Herbert are larger than those of Cukit; and it does not appear, on the face of the deed, that Cukit had any right to grant, but rather that he had not. The words used by Cukit will not pass a right of way—Baudeley v. Brook (11).

[PARKE, B.—It does not appear on the face of the deed that the tenement was ever conveyed to Cukit at all.]

Then the fact of a grant by Herbert appearing on the face of the deed, the issue on the fourth plea must be found for the plaintiff as the rejoinder of non concessit admits the seisin of Herbert. On the point of pleading, Cowlshaw v. Cheslyn is expressly in point; nor are the cases cited by the other side at all inconsistent with the decision in that case. In Baddeley v. Lepingwell, the question was on a copyhold estate, and the only matter in dispute was, whether the right person had been admitted. Then they would not have been allowed to dispute the fact of the seisin. In Eden's case the argument was put as in that of Morris v. Dimes (12); and there the Court did not decide upon the present point. By analogy to the rules of pleading it would be anomalous to allow these facts to be put in issue by the traverse of another. The case of Cowlshaw v. Cheslyn is expressly in point.

The judgment of the Court was subsequently delivered (July 3) by—

PARKE, B.—The only question which remained for consideration in this case was, how the issue ought to have been found on the rejoinder to the replication to the fourth plea. That replication states that the corporation of Liverpool were seised in their demesne as of fee of the locus in quo, and being so seised, by indenture between the corporation and Herbert, demised it to Herbert and his executors, administrators, and assigns for three lives and twenty-one years; that the corporation delivered seisin to Herbert, who thereby became and was seised and possessed of the locus in quo, and that Herbert being so seised of the locus in quo, and during the continuance of the seisin, by indenture between Cukit of the first part, Herbert of the second part, and Morland and Williams of the third part, granted to Morland and Williams a right of way over the locus in quo. The rejoinder to this replication is, that Herbert did not grant the right of way modo et formâ. On the trial, the indenture was produced, which recited the demise to Herbert by the corporation; the assignment of the lease by Herbert to Cukit by way of mortgage to secure 1,200*l.*; that Herbert had agreed to sell part of the land comprised in the lease to Morland and Williamson for a sum out of which the sum due from Herbert should be paid to Cukit, and by the same indenture Cukit, at the request of Herbert, bargained, sold, assigned, and transferred, and Herbert granted, bargained, sold, assigned, and transferred to Morland and Williamson, part of the demised premises, together with the right of way in question.

(11) Cro. Jac. 189.

(12) 1 Ad. & El. 654; s. c. 3 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 170.

Two objections were made by the defendant: first, that at the time of the supposed grant Herbert had no estate in the locus in quo, and therefore the grant did not operate as his grant; and, secondly, that on the face of the instrument itself, considering the recitals, Herbert did not purport to grant the right of way. To this it was answered by the plaintiff, that the seisin of Herbert was admitted by the rejoinder, and the fact of the grant only was in issue, and that the indenture did prove, if the seisin was admitted, a grant by Herbert. We intimated our opinion that if the title of Herbert to make the grant was not in issue on the rejoinder of "ne grantia pas," the grant in fact was proved by the indenture; so that the only question is, whether the title was in issue upon the replication denying the grant. When in a pleading, one of several material and traversable averments is denied, the others are admitted in that suit (and indeed in others between the same parties, if the issue be joined against the party traversing), and therefore in a case in which it is averred that one was seised in fee at the time of the grant, and being so seised granted, the denial of the grant would seem to admit the seisin in fee; and this is the case of Cowlishaw v. Cheslyn, which was rightly decided, unless there be some technical rule that in all cases the traverse of a grant puts in issue the power to grant. Mr. Crompton contended that it did; but the authorities cited do not support the position. In Eden's case, the averment was, that the Queen was seised, and granted by her letters patent under the great seal, and the traverse was, that she did not grant the tenements by the said letters patent; and it is stated by Lord Coke that the letters patent being of record and shewn to the Court, cannot be denied, and therefore the effect of the issue non concessit is that the Queen had nothing in the land, or that the tenements did not pass by the letters patent; and the same point was decided in Hynde's case. This is a peculiarity belonging to grants from the Crown, by reason of their being made by matter of record. In Baddeley v. Leppingwell, the denial of the grant of the lord of the manor in the rejoinder, where the replication stated that he was seised in fee, and granted to the plaintiff and another, was held not to traverse the admittance only, but the power to admit from the nature of the copyhold tenure, for the admission is nothing without title. The traverse there admitted the seisin in fee of the manor, and put in issue the admittance and the right of the lord so seised in fee to admit. Supposing the pleading had been of a surrender to the lord to the use of A. B. and a grant by him to A. B. the traverse of the grant would have put in issue the admittance only.

Again, in Taylor v. Needham, where Lord Chief Justice Mansfield says that the plea of non demisit puts in issue the title, the declaration was on a quod cum demississet, it did not state the seisin or title as a distinct fact. So it would be in an ejectment, if instead of not guilty non demisit were pleaded; the issue should exclude the title of the lessor. In Martaine v. Hardy it is said, that on a traverse of a lease for years by parol, it was held that the defendant might shew that the lessor had nothing in the land at the time of the demise. No doubt this was between lessor and lessee; and thus, Litt. sect. 58. applies where it is said the lessee may say that the lessor had nothing at the time of the lease, unless the lease be made by deed indented; and Lord Coke says, in his comment on this passage, he may plead that the lessor non demisit, and give in evidence the other matter. That the case in Dyer was a case between lessor and lessee may be collected from the comparison to a formedon, in which the tenant must plead non dedit, which puts in issue the title as well as the gift, and in declarations in formedon the seisin is not (commonly at least) averred—Rastall, 'Formedon,' 362, &c. In the case there referred to in the Year Book, 43 Edw. 3. 19, pl. 3, in a writ of intrusion, where the seisin and lease of the ancestor were averred, the traverse allowed to be good was of the seisin; so that the case does not shew that under the traverse of the lease the title to the lease would have been in question.

There is another case which has a most important bearing on this question. It is that of Hudson v. Jones (13). In replevin the avowant made title by grant of a reversion expectant on an estate for life to the plaintiff, to which reversion the rent was incident, to which grant the plaintiff attained. Upon non concessit, it was a question whether the want of attornment should be proved, and it was urged, that on that plea the effect and operation of the grant was first in issue, and that the grant, if ineffectual, was void; but it was held that the attornment need not be proved: and the reason of the opinion was, because it was traversable, and what is not traversed is admitted, and the grant is perfect so far as the grantor can perfect it. Upon the whole, therefore, we think that the case of Cowlshaw v. Cheslyn was rightly decided; and that when the pleading states a title to demise or grant, and so gives an opportunity to the opposite party to traverse it, the traverse of the demise or grant does not include the title, but only the fact of the grant. The case cited, however, does not precisely agree with that now under consideration, for there is no positive averment here that Herbert was seised in fee at the time of the grant. His title is derivative; it is deduced to him from the corporation of Liverpool, and he is said to have been thereby seised and possessed, and being so seised, and during the continuance of the demise by indenture granted the right of way. The question therefore arises, which the Court, in Morris v. Dimes, refused to decide; we think, however, that the same reason applies to this case as to the supposed case of a positive averment of a seisin in fee at the time of the grant. By the traverse of the grant, the previous steps of the derivative title not being traversed are admitted; and supposing that the statement of Herbert's being so seised is not an averment that he was actually seised at the time of the grant, so as to be traversable, it is clear that he must be presumed to be so, the term continuing until the contrary is shewn by the defendant, by shewing that his interest had ceased in some way—The Bishop of Meath v. the Marquis of Winchester (14); and as there is no plea shewing this, the seisin of Herbert must be taken to continue to the time of the grant: and then the only matter in issue on the traverse of the grant is the grant itself. And if this were not so, the effect of denying a grant, where it was made by a person having a derivative title shewn on the pleadings from the owner in fee, would be the same as a denial of every previous step by which the title to lease is shewn.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the issue on the rejoinder to this replication ought to be found for the plaintiff; and there must be a new trial, unless the counsel on both sides agree to have the verdict so entered to avoid further expense.

1848. } WALKER, BARBER AND ANOTHER

Bill of Exchange—Special Indorsement—Liability of Indorser.

A bill of exchange, bearing several indorsements in blank, was subsequently indorsed by the defendant to the plaintiffs specially in these terms: "Pay Messrs. B. and W. & Co. or order, W. Macdonald." Then followed an indorsement, "Per proc. of the Eastwood Company.—Thos. Goodwill." The Eastwood Company and the firm of Messrs. B. and W. & Co. consisted of the same persons. The bill afterwards came into the hands of other parties, and being presented by the holder to the acceptor, was refused payment on the ground of its not having been indorsed in terms by B. and W. & Co. The defendant, on the bill being returned to him and payment demanded, suggested that the words "B. and W. & Co." should be inserted on the bill under his indorsement; but ultimately, after his suggestion had been complied with, refused to pay the bill. B. W. & Co. accordingly brought an action against him, to which he pleaded non-presentment of the bill:—Held, that the defendant had no right to restrain the negotiability of the bill by a special indorsement; that the presentment was sufficient; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

This was an action of debt by the plaintiffs as indorsees of a bill of exchange, dated the 21st day of October 1846, drawn by E. Bliss upon and accepted by J. Williams, for the payment to the order of the said E. Bliss of 86*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* four months after date. The declaration stated that the said E.

Bliss indorsed the bill to J. Crowley & Co.; that J. Crowley & Co. indorsed the bill to S. F. Stephens; that S. F. Stephens indorsed it to Bartlett, Parrott & Co.; that Bartlett, Parrott & Co. indorsed it to the defendant, and that the defendant indorsed it to the plaintiffs. The defendant pleaded, first, a denial of the indorsement by him to the plaintiffs; secondly, a denial of the presentment of the bill for payment; and thirdly, a denial of the notice of dishonour.

The cause came on for trial, before Parke, B., at the Middlesex sittings, in Trinity term, 1847, when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs for the amount of the principal and interest on the bill, subject to the opinion of this Court upon the following

CASE.

The plaintiffs produced and read at this trial the bill of exchange mentioned in the pleadings, and which was as follows:—

“London, 21st October 1846.

Four months after date, pay to my order eighty-six pounds eighteen shillings and fourpence, value received.

Per proc. Edwin Bliss,
Chas. Jeffreys.”

“Mr. John Williams, brushmaker, Cheltenham; per proc. Edwin Bliss, Chas. Jeffreys; James Crowley & Co.; Saml. F. Stephens; Bartlett, Parrott & Co.

“Pay Messrs. Barber and Walker & Co., or order, W. Macdonald; Barber and Walker & Co., per proc. of the Eastwood Company, Thos. Goodwill; per proc. Nottingham and Notts Banking Company, Ade. Lassall, pro manager.

“Pay Messrs. Ormerod and Hardcastle, or order, Elliott and Cragg; Ormerod and Hardcastle.”

There was also a reference in case of need at the bottom of the back of the bill, as follows, “At Cunliffe’s, b.”

The above indorsement in the name of “Barber and Walker & Co.” was not on the bill prior to or at the time when it was presented for payment, but was written upon the bill afterwards, under the circumstances hereinafter stated. The bill of exchange in question was drawn and indorsed as mentioned in the declaration, and was, previously to its being presented for payment as hereinafter mentioned, accepted by the drawer, payable at the London and Westminster Bank. The indorsement by the defendant to the plaintiffs was a special indorsement, in the words and figures following, “Pay Messrs. Barber and Walker & Co., or order, W. Macdonald.” When the bill became due it was in the hands of Messrs. Jones, Loyd & Co., bankers, of London, as holders thereof. The bill was presented on their behalf for payment, when due, at the London and Westminster Bank, and payment was refused by such bank, and the answer then given by them was “No advice,” which is the usual answer when country bills are refused payment; and that answer was given at once, without referring to the indorsements. At the time of such presentment the indorsement “Barber and Walker & Co.” was placed thereon under the circumstances hereinafter stated; all the other indorsements above set out were on the bill at the time of the said presentment. After the dishonour, Messrs. Jones, Loyd & Co. took the bill to Messrs. Cunliffe & Co., but they refused to take up such bill in consequence, as they stated, of the want of indorsement in the name of “Barber and Walker & Co.” Due notice was given to the defendant by the plaintiffs, and in due time.

The plaintiffs after receipt and in consequence of the last-mentioned letter wrote the indorsement of “Barber and Walker & Co.” on the said bill, in the manner in which the same now appears, as stated in this case, and immediately returned the bill to the defendant, who thereupon returned the same to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs proved at the trial that they were the parties and the only parties constituting the several firms of Barber and Walker & Co. and the Eastwood Company, and that these firms respectively carried on the business of two separate collieries; but the business of both the said firms was carried on by the said plaintiffs, at the same place of business in Nottinghamshire, and the object of using the names of the two firms was to keep the accounts of the two collieries distinct. The plaintiffs also proved that Thomas Goodwill, the party who indorsed the bill for the plaintiffs under the name of the Eastwood

Company, was authorized by the plaintiffs to indorse bills for them, and was in the habit of so indorsing bills in the name of both firms. The following evidence was offered by the defendant, and objected to by the plaintiffs, and was received by the learned Judge, subject to the opinion of this Court as to its being admissible, and is to be considered and treated as part of the case only in the event of the Court being of opinion that it was admissible evidence for the defendant. Several clerks in banking-houses in London were called for the defendant, and stated that it was the usage and custom of merchants, and of merchants and bankers in London, that when bills of exchange were specially indorsed to any parties by a particular name or firm, the same name or firm should be used in the indorsement by such last-mentioned parties, and that it was the usage of London bankers not to pay bills indorsed by any parties in a different form or manner from that in which they had been previously indorsed to such parties, not even if the deviation was only in a single letter.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the presentment of the bill indorsed as above stated, was sufficient as against the defendant, and whether the defendant is liable to the present plaintiffs under the circumstances in this action. If the Court should be of opinion in the affirmative, the verdict for the plaintiffs was to stand for the amount of the principal and interest until final judgment. If the Court should be of opinion in the negative, a nonsuit was to be entered; and either party, with the consent of the Court, was to be at liberty to convert this case into a special verdict.

Crompton for the plaintiffs (June 7).—The defendant is liable upon the indorsement. The question arises upon the presentment, and that presentment is good. It is contended on the other side that the bankers to whom the bill was presented for payment were not bound to pay it unless a valid title to the bill were shewn; and it is said that a valid title was not shewn because the plaintiffs indorsed the bill, not in the names in which it was indorsed to them, but in the name of the Eastwood Company. They however, constituted the Eastwood Company. Leonard v. Wilson (1) is precisely in point, and shews that parties to whom a bill has been indorsed specially may give a title by indorsement, although they indorse it in a different name. The defendant in this case had no right to restrain the negotiability of the bill by a special indorsement—Smith v. Clarke (2).

Bovill, for the defendant.—Bankers are not bound by their usage to pay bills of exchange unless all the indorsements are regular. The defendant's case is, that he placed his name upon the back of the bill, and directed the acceptor to pay it only in the event of there being a written order of Barber and Walker & Co. in a particular form. That written order was not given.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The defendant was not competent to impose that restriction.]

This was not a good presentment by the plaintiffs as against the defendant, for the latter cannot be charged unless title is shewn through him. Leonard v. Wilson is not in point, for there the action was against the previous indorser and not against the party making the indorsement.

Crompton replied.

On the following day the judgment of the Court was given by—

POLLOCK, C.B.—We all think that in this case the plaintiffs are entitled to the judgment of the Court. The case of Smith v. Clarke, which was cited in the course of the argument, establishes the proposition which has ever since been acted upon, that where a bill has once become negotiable, no person can afterwards restrain its negotiability. Now, in the present case the only question is that which arises upon the second plea, denying the presentment for payment. Was then the acceptor bound to pay this bill upon its being presented to him for payment under the circumstances of this case? The presentment in the plea, as was stated by my Brother Alderson in the course of the argument, must mean a presentment which, upon the bill being dishonoured, would make the defendant liable on his indorsement to the plaintiffs. What then is the defendant's promise to pay? The promise is, that the indorser will pay to the indorsee and those claiming under him if the acceptor does not pay to a person entitled to call on him for payment of the bill when due. Here the presentment was by the holder, and the holder was entitled to claim from the acceptor. The case of Leonard v. Wilson is a decisive authority upon this point. For these reasons, we think that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, and inasmuch as we have no doubt whatever upon the subject, there will be no special verdict.

IN THE

LAW JOURNAL REPORTS,

VOL. XXVI.—XVII. NEW SERIES.

[In the following Index, Q.B. refers to the QUEEN'S BENCH REPORTS, C.P. to the COMMON PLEAS, and Ex. to the EXCHEQUER OF PLEAS.]

Abatement—Plea in, for non-joinder of co-contractor, set aside where affidavit verifying it incorrectly stated place of residence. Place of business not sufficient, C.P. 95

— Rule that where over demanded, defendant has same time for pleading after it is granted as at time of demand, applies to plea in abatement, Ex. 203

— To declaration in sci. fa. stating recovery against public officer of banking copartnership of 51,373*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, defendant pleaded in abatement issuing writ of sci. fa. on judgment recovered against said public officer, &c. for 51,373*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*; and plea then stated declaration in sci. fa. against one J. D.; and that judgment against J. D. and that against defendant were one and same judgment; and it averred identity of companies described in writs as L. and W. R. Banking Company, and that G. S. was public officer of latter company at time of judgment; that J. D. was still living, and that writ and suit against J. D. were still depending. Affidavit verifying plea, stating that paper writing thereunto annexed was a true copy of issue in action against J. D.; and that judgment was signed in such action against J. D. on &c. for 51,373*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*,—insufficient, and judgment signed by plaintiff regular, Ex. 294

Acknowledgment of Married Women—Sufficiency of certificate of acknowledgment by married woman taken before Commissioners in India, by person describing himself as "Major General," on affidavits of General's handwriting and rank, C.P. 1

— Affidavit verifying certificate of acknowledgment of married woman to bar her dower, written on paper, instead of parchment, according to usual practice; received and filed, C.P. 107

— Certificate of acknowledgment of deed by married woman, described her as Mary, reputed wife of A, otherwise Mary —, spinster; she was similarly described in deed.—Certificate and affidavit received and filed, C.P. 110

— Certificate of acknowledgment of married woman under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 83. need not state specific place at which it has been taken; it is enough if deed appear to have been executed within terms of commission. British consul abroad has no authority per se to administer oaths verifying documents required by this act; but if a public notary of foreign country certify that by laws of that country British consul is competent to administer oaths, certificate and other documents sworn before him will be received, C.P. 111

— Declaration that defendant, an attorney, wrongfully and without consent or retainer of plaintiff, entered an appearance for him in an action brought by D. (a third party,) against plaintiff, and took upon himself to conduct action, and such proceedings were thereupon had that D. recovered judgment, and issued execution, and plaintiff was obliged to pay amount recovered and costs of execution, and "by reason of the premises" was injured in his credit and character,—is bad after verdict, Q.B. 286

— maintainable by new incumbent against former perpetual curate for leaving house and lands out of repair, Q.B. 366

— Where declaration states that plaintiffs, manufacturers of cutlery, were accustomed to mark their knives with certain marks denoting their manufacture, and that defendants, intending to injure plaintiffs, did fraudulently impose similar marks on knives made by defendants to induce public to believe that knives made by defendants were manufactured by plaintiffs, &c.,—it is properly left to jury to consider, whether there was such resemblance between defendants' mark and those used by plaintiffs as was calculated to deceive the public, and whether defendants used marks with intention to deceive. No person has a right to sell his own goods as and for goods manufactured by another person, C.P. 52 — Declaration that defendant wrongfully and in-

- juriously kept a ferocious dog, well knowing him to be ferocious; and that he kept his said dog so negligently that he bit and worried divers sheep of the plaintiff.—See Interlocutory a material averment in declaration, and is put in issue by not guilty, C.P. 124

- Declaration alleging that in consideration plaintiff would go to L. for purpose of marrying defendant, defendant promised to marry plaintiff within reasonable time after her arrival,—amendable at trial by stating that in consideration plaintiff promised defendant to marry him, and would go to L. for purpose of marrying him, and would within reasonable time marry him, defendant promised, &c. Not sufficient objection to amending declaration, that it will deprive defendant of means of moving in arrest of judgment, C.P. 298
- of writ of summons by adding new defendant, to save Statute of Limitations, not allowed, Ex. 90
- at Nisi Prius, of declaration in slander (see Slander), Ex. 151
- Animals.* See Action.
- Annuity*—Quære, whether annuity payable out of suitors' fund, chargeable with judgment, Ex. 13
- Sufficiency of following statement in memorial required by 55 Geo. 3. c. 141, under column "Consideration, and how paid":—"5,000*l.* made up of five several sums of 300*l.*, 200*l.*, 2,000*l.*, 1,500*l.*, and 1,000*l.* previously lent and advanced to C. H. to or for use of J. L. and E. J. L. and owing to C. H. on security of five several bills of exchange, drawn by E. J. L. upon and accepted by J. L. and indorsed by E. J. L. said consideration being paid and satisfied by cancellation of said bills and a release, &c. Statement of pre-existing debt need not shew how such debt has arisen, Ex. 43
- Appeal.* See Highway. Poor Law.
- Appraiser.* See Pleading.
- Apprentice.* See Poor Law.
- Arbitration*—Inadmissibility of award on trial of indictment for perjury (see Evidence), Q.B. 187
- Upon reference of cause and all matters in difference, with power to enter verdict for either party,—arbitrator no power to order judgment non obstante veredicto. Award of mutual releases in general terms is sufficient. Award directing verdict to be entered for plaintiff on certain issues, with 1*s.* damages, "which sum, except for my finding upon other issues, plaintiff would be entitled to recover in said cause," as regarded the damages sufficiently final, C.P. 201
- Court has power, under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 39, to enlarge time for arbitrator to make award, where arbitrator having the power omitted to do so, C.P. 324
- Award directed that plaintiff should pay defendant 12*s.* 0*d.*, amount which umpire found to be due to him; a demand of 26*s.* 16*s.* 2*d.*, costs of the cause, had been made upon plaintiff, and payment refused, but no demand had been made of the 12*s.* 0*d.*—Court refused to make absolute a rule for payment of sum demanded, Ex. 208
- Award not set aside on ground of arbitrator having made mistake in point of law, in awarding damages in action of debt in respect of extra work where remedy was by action for breach of covenant; there being no misconduct, and the arbitrator having acted within his jurisdiction. Rule to set aside order of reference by corporation, because not made under seal, and attorney who entered into it not appointed under seal,—refused, Ex. 223
- An attorney appeared for a corporation in action of debt, and consented to Judge's order, referring "all claims made in the action" to arbitration. Arbitrator having awarded to plaintiff a sum actually claimed in action,—Held, that question, whether that sum a debt or not was submitted to arbitrator, and his decision final, even if erroneous. An attorney authorized to appear for a party in a suit has incidentally authority to refer it, and corporation having appeared by attorney, to knowledge of directors, they were bound by his acts as attorney, though he had not authority under seal, Ex. 297
- See Railway.
- Arrest*—Departure from England, for purpose of returning to Scotland, not a fuga within exception in 18th section of Scotch Sequestration Act; and defendant, arrested by Judge's order made after warrant of protection granted by Lord Ordinary, entitled to his discharge, Q.B. 186
- Warrant of protection from arrest, granted by Lord Ordinary to bankrupt, under Scotch Sequestration Act, inoperative if bankrupt already in custody. In such case proper course is to apply for a warrant of liberation under section 17. of that statute, Ex. 201
- Plaintiff having been nonsuited, defendant made up judgment roll, and entered thereon award of ca. sa. for taxed costs: Plaintiff brought writ of error and assigned as error entry of ca. sa.—Error assigned not frivolous. Semble,—That plaintiff, by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. s. 57, is protected from being taken in execution for costs, C.P. 200
- Upon appeal against Judge's order, to hold to bail under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 3, affidavits in denial of plaintiff's cause of action admissible; but Court will not interfere unless there is clearly no cause of action. Where upon Judge's order, and copies defendant gave bail to sheriff, and on appeal against order it appeared that defendant had no intention of leaving England for two months, but that plaintiff would not be able to get judgment in that time.—Court cancelled bail-bond, but directed order and copies to stand, Ex. 53
- Insufficiency of affidavit to hold to bail in stating that defendant "before and at time of commencement of this action was and still is justly indebted to deponent in 100*l.* for work done, and materials provided, and goods manufactured and made by the said deponent for said defendant, and at his request," Ex. 55

- Assault*—A party, supposed to appear before two

Justices for an assault, appeared, and pleaded "not guilty:" prosecutor withdrew his complaint, and defendant was discharged.—This a hearing and dismissal, which entitled defendant to certificate that charge dismissed as not proved, under 9 Geo. 4. c. 31. s. 27; and plea, stating those facts, and that certificate had been granted, a good defence under section 28. to action of trespass for assault, C.P. 176

Assumpsit—Declaration that defendant possessed of ship, and plaintiff, master mariner, having interest in N. for loading a vessel: and it having been proposed that defendant should give plaintiff command of said ship, for a voyage to West Indies and back, it was agreed that in consideration of plaintiff having interest in N. for loading vessel defendant would give plaintiff command of her, with understanding that plaintiff would use all possible exertions for benefit of ship and owners: and that for such services defendant would pay plaintiff 8*l.* per month, and other sums during voyage, with outward and homeward primage. Allegation of mutual promises. Averment, that defendant gave plaintiff command of ship, and that he set out on voyage, and carried and delivered outward cargo: that plaintiff arrived at N, and finding that homeward cargo could not be obtained without disadvantage, proceeded to R, and there took in homeward cargo, and delivered same at London, and then resigned command to defendant, who accepted same; that from time command was given to him till he so resigned it, plaintiff used all possible exertions for benefit of ship and owners. Breach, non-payment by defendant of monies due to plaintiff. Plea, that plaintiff did not use all possible exertions, &c. modo et forma.—Held, on demurrer, that declaration imported sufficient consideration; and that plaintiff, having taken command of ship, might maintain the action. Plea traversed only part of consideration and therefore insufficient, Q.B. 31

— Declaration alleging that in consideration plaintiff and W. D. would sell and assign to defendant their co-partnership business, defendant promised plaintiff to pay him all money he had advanced in respect of co-partnership, and for which co-partnership was accountable to plaintiff; averring performance by plaintiff and W. D, and that plaintiff, at time of promise, had advanced sum of money in respect of co-partnership, for which co-partnership was, at time of promise, accountable to him; and alleging, as breach, non-payment of that sum by defendant,—discloses sufficient consideration to entitle plaintiff to sue alone, Ex. 36

Attorney—London agent of S. & J, attorneys in country, by their directions, issued fi. fa. and warrant to levy on goods of debtor in Wilts, at suit of one of their clients, and referred officer to S. & J. for instructions. Officer not being able to meet with S. & J. paid amount of levy to undersheriff, who without any instructions from S. & J. remitted money to London agent, whose name was on warrant, and who refused to pay money over to client, claiming to apply it in reduction of general balance due from S. & J, for agency business.—No privity of contract to support action by client against town agent for money had and received to his use. But money appearing to have been paid under a mistake, and retained against express directions of S. & J,—Court, upon application by client, compelled town agent to refund it, Q.B. 77

— A creditor who sues in superior court for debt for which he might have sued in county court cannot be considered as within jurisdiction of county court; and section 67. of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. being that privilege shall not exempt "from the jurisdiction" of county court, and not "from the provisions of the act."—Attorney is not deprived of his privilege of suing in superior court for a cause of action within jurisdiction of county court, Q.B. 179

— Declaration in debt on decree of Supreme Court of N: plea that decree was in respect of an amended bill, and before filing thereof defendant was out of jurisdiction and so continued, and was never served with copy of said bill, nor had notice of any process calling on him to answer it, and that proceedings were taken in his absence and ex parte: replication, that at commencement of suit defendant was within jurisdiction, and duly served with process in respect of original bill in said suit, and appeared and appointed H. E. attorney for him in suit, and H. E. accordingly became and was attorney of defendant, and authorized to conduct his defence in suit, and that while he was such attorney, and so authorized, he had notice of amended bill: rejoinder traversed that H. E. had notice of amended bill modo et forma, on which issue was joined.—Traverse an admission that H. E. had such an authority as would render replication good, viz. to act as attorney as well in respect of amended as original bill. — An attorney's bill of costs was by Judge's order, on application of client, and by consent, referred to taxation: order contained no undertaking nor any direction to pay what should be found due on taxation, and was made without prejudice to client disputing retainer: by agreement between parties, question of retainer submitted to Master, who decided it was made out to his satisfaction, and allocatur accordingly.—Order and allocatur authorized Court to order judgment to be entered up, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. s. 43, for amount as "certified to be due and directed to be paid," C.P. 222

Banking Company—In order to issue sci. fa. against retired shareholders in joint-stock banking company, under 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. s. 13, it is sufficient if reasonable and bond fide attempts have been made to obtain satisfaction from existing shareholders; and not essential that executions should have been issued against every existing shareholder, if probable that such executions would have been ineffectual. What sufficient prima facie evidence that party was shareholder when contracts entered into, where judgment signed against public officer of banking company in action brought on contracts entered into at various dates. Fact that party not then a shareholder may be pleaded to sci. fa. No answer to application that there has been a fraudulent transfer of shares from a person who might have been proceeded against, but to which plaintiff is not shewn to have been party. Plaintiff not compelled to proceed against insolvent shareholder, who is entitled in equity to reimbursement from other solvent persons. If sci. fa. issues against person who was a shareholder when part only of contracts recovered upon were entered into, Court will limit execution against him to amount for which he is liable. Judgment having been signed in action of debt against public officer by default for nominal debt in declaration, Court will grant leave to issue sci. fa. on that judgment against former shareholders upon undertaking not to levy for more than is really due, Q.B. 9

— Memorandum to bind lands of member of banking company on judgment recovered against public officer, C.P. 15

— Rule for sci. fa. against former partners of banking company under 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. s. 13, not set aside because plaintiff had collateral security from bank, which might have been made productive, and which he omitted to mention in affidavits on which rule granted, C.P. 98

— Insufficiency of declaration in sci. fa. on judgment recovered against public officer of banking co-partnership which alleges that defendant at time of judgment recovered was and from thence hitherto hath been and still is a member of the said co-partnership. Semble—That writ in that form would be quashed on application to Judge at chambers, Ex. 13

— Scire facias on judgment against public officer of banking co-partnership, alleging that A. B. "at the time of the commencement of the said action and at the time of the recovery and giving of said judgment was, and from thence continually has been, and still is a member of the said co-partnership," quashed, Ex. 92

— Deed of settlement of joint-stock bank provided "that the directors should have a lien on the shares and stock of every shareholder for all debts due to the company, and that such lien should at all times be the paramount lien on the shares and stock of such shareholder; and that directors were empowered to cancel and declare forfeited the shares, or to sell and dispose of them, or otherwise deal with the same to obtain payment of the said debts."—Company had a lien against shareholder who had overdrawn his account, both on shares and dividends arising from them, Ex. 269

— Where under 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. s. 13, rule to issue scire facias upon judgment recovered against public officer of joint-stock banking company, obtained against former member of company, was afterwards enlarged, and finally abandoned upon terms of payment of costs by plaintiff,—plaintiff not precluded from again coming to Court for leave to issue such scire facias. No answer to such motion that such judgment was fraudulently concocted; but that defence must be raised by plea, or by application to set aside proceedings as fraudulent. Right course is in first instance to issue writs of scire facias against those who are members of company at time scire facias applied for, and not against those who were members at time action was commenced. Plaintiff allowed to issue scire facias against members of company at time contract entered into, if there is reasonable certainty that execution issued against those members of company who are primarily liable would be fruitless. Persons who have become members of joint-stock banking company after contract entered into, and have ceased to be so at time judgment was signed, are not within provisions of 13th section of 7 Geo. 4. c. 46, and are exempt from all legal liability, Ex. 321

— Trader, being indebted to defendants, on 1st of July files declaration of insolvency, pursuant to 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, and on following day gives notice thereof to defendants; at subsequent period of same day defendants levy an execution on trader's goods. Fiat in bankruptcy issues day following.— Act of bankruptcy dates from filing declaration of insolvency, and defendants, having had notice thereof, not entitled to proceeds of execution within meaning of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29, s. 1, Ex. 61

— Plaintiff, defendant, and another were co-sureties for one A: defendant became bankrupt, at which time plaintiff had not paid his share of debt, but subsequently he paid more than his proportion.— Bankruptcy of defendant no answer to action for contribution, as case was not within 52nd section of 6 Geo. 4. c. 16, plaintiff not being a "person liable for" the bankrupt's debt within the meaning of that section, Ex. 169

— In 1843, H, residing in Australia, being indebted to B. in 77*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*, B. on 8th of January 1844 assigned debt to W, and on 22nd of January joined W. in letter to H, apprising him of assignment, and requiring him to pay debt to W: this letter was posted by W. to H, in Australia, in ordinary way in that country, and could not have reached Australia before 10th of February had it been posted on 8th of January: on 10th of February fiat in bankruptcy issued against B: on 29th of January 1844 bill for 50*l.* remitted by H. in Australia, who had no notice of bankruptcy, to bankrupt, and by him handed over to W. Mandamus commanding overseer to give such certificate to T. H: return that he had no evidence that T. H. was real resident holder and occupier, and that he had reason to believe that T. H. was not real resident holder, &c., because he was rated jointly with T. D: plea, that when certificate demanded, defendant (the overseer) well knew that T. H. was real holder and occupier.—Defendant not responsible on facts as they appeared on pleadings, if he judged wrong but honestly. Writ insufficient, Q.B. 332

— Conviction of seller of beer for permitting drunkenness and other disorderly conduct need not be by two Justices of division within which licensed house situate. Unnecessary to allege that conviction took place within three calendar months after offence. Offence properly stated to be contrary to form of statutes. Need not state names of persons permitted to be drunk, or allege that they were unknown. Offence charged to have been committed not double. Licence need not be set out. Conviction not bad for not ascertaining costs. Conviction need not be on parchment, Q.B. 355

Bigamy—Marriage with deceased wife's sister void, and proof of subsequent marriage with another woman during life of deceased wife's sister will not support indictment for bigamy, Q.B. 81

Bill of Exchange—To declaration on bill drawn by A. on, and accepted by defendant, payable to A.'s order, and by A. indorsed to B, and by B. to plaintiff, plea, that defendant accepted bill for accommodation of A. and B, and without consideration, &c., and on terms that it should not be negotiated after it was due, and that it was indorsed to plaintiff after it was due, without defendant's privity, is bad, Q.B. 4

— Declaration by indorsee against acceptor of bill, payable three months after date, "which period has elapsed;" alleged promise by defendant to pay according to tenour and effect of bill. Breach, that defendant has disregarded his said promise, and has not paid said sum, &c.—Demurrer, that declaration did not sufficiently shew that three days of grace had elapsed before action, set aside as frivolous, Q.B. 7

— Debt by drawer against acceptor of bill of exchange: plea, that bill indorsed by plaintiff to M. D, who then became and thence hitherto remained holder thereof: replication, that plaintiff was holder of bill at commencement of suit, absque hoc that M. D. from time of indorsement hitherto remained holder thereof.—Replication not too large, and plaintiff at liberty to traverse material allegation in plea, and not bound to state specially how he acquired bill from M. D, Q.B. 69

— Drawer of dishonoured bill being told by holders that they understood he had received the money from H, the acceptor, to take up bill, said that H. still owed him 10*l.*, and he should keep the 10*l.* he had received, and leave holders to sue H. on bill.—Evidence for jury of notice of dishonour to drawer, Q.B. 142

— In action by indorsee of bill of exchange and issue denying indorsement, plaintiff rested his case, in first instance, on proof of indorser's handwriting: Defendant then gave evidence that plaintiff was too poor to have discounted bill, or to have it indorsed to him.—Held, that plaintiff ought not to be allowed to give evidence in reply to shew plaintiff's ability to discount bill, and that, in fact, he had discounted it, as such evidence was merely confirmatory of plaintiff's prima facie case, and not in contradiction of defendant's witnesses, Q.B. 194

Bill of Exchange (continued).—Principal who authorizes an agent to accept bill of exchange, liable as acceptor, though wrongly described by his agent in acceptance. Where bill accepted by drawee's wife in her own name, she having authority from her husband to accept bills,—husband liable on bill as acceptor, C.P. 121

Notice of dishonour:—"I am the holder of a bill drawn by you on L. M. for 98*l.* 15*s.*, which became due yesterday, and is unpaid; and I have to state, that unless the same is paid to me immediately, I shall proceed against you without delay for the amount. Amount of bill 98*l.* 15*s.*, noting 5*s.*, total 99*l.*."—Word "noting" held to be part of notice; that it implied presentment and non-payment; and that notice was good, C.P. 181

To action upon bill for 25*l.*, drawn by defendant, indorsed by him to K, and by K. to plaintiff, defendant pleaded that K.'s indorsement was in blank, and that after bill was indorsed and became payable, K. paid plaintiff 25*l.* in satisfaction; that plaintiff delivered bill to K, who then and until and at time of commencement of action hath been and still is holder thereof. Replication, that at commencement of suit plaintiff was holder of bill; without this, that at time of commencement of suit K. was holder. Defendant having demurred to replication, Judge set aside demurrer as frivolous. Replication good, as it puts in issue so much of plea as is necessary to make K. holder of bill, Ex. 8

Plea by E, one of three persons sued as acceptors of bill of exchange, that before and at time, &c., defendants were partners, upon terms that neither of them should, without consent of others, accept any bill of exchange in name of firm, otherwise than for bond fide debts or liabilities of firm; and that said bill was accepted by other defendants in name of firm without consent of defendant E, and in fraud of him, and in violation of said terms of partnership, and was delivered by other defendants to plaintiff for money owing to plaintiff from one of them, and not for any debt or liability of firm, of all which plaintiff had notice at time of delivery of bill to him; and that there never was any value or consideration, except as aforesaid, for acceptance of bill, or for payment thereof by defendant E; and that he held and now holds same without value or consideration, concluding with a verification.—Plea, an argumentative denial of acceptance, Ex. 70

Declaration by indorsee against acceptor, that bill drawn on 20th of September 1847, payable four months after date, and that defendant then accepted said bill: plea, infancy: defendant became of full age on 24th December 1847.—This no evidence of defendant's being an infant at time of acceptance, Ex. 233

A dishonoured bill was sent in due time to place of business of indorser, for purpose of giving him notice of dishonour: place was closed and no one there, and no written notice of dishonour was left.—These facts not prove issue that notice of dishonour given, their legal effect being to dispense with necessity for giving notice, and pleading must be according to legal effect. Semble—That holder may elect to treat absence of indorser as extending time for giving notice; and notice of dishonour given at place of business, if given at first reasonable opportunity afterwards, will support averment of due notice having been given, Ex. 291

Assumpsit by indorsee of bill of exchange for 25*l.*, drawn by defendant, indorsed by him to T. R. K, and by him to plaintiff. Plea, that indorsement by T. R. K. to plaintiff was in blank; that after such indorsement and on day of bill becoming due T. R. K. paid plaintiff 25*l.*, in bill specified, in full satisfaction of said sum of 25*l.*, and plaintiff then delivered bill to T. R. K, who, at and after commencement of action, was and still is holder of bill. Replication, that at commencement of suit plaintiffs were holders of bill, without this, that at commencement of suit T. R. K. was holder thereof. Verdict for plaintiffs.—On application for replender, issue held to be material, Ex. 345

After several indorsements in blank an indorser has no right to restrain the negotiability of the bill by a special indorsement. Sufficiency of presentment, Ex. 377

Broker.—Defendants, share-brokers at Liverpool, on 30th of August 1845, bought for plaintiff, also share-broker, thirty-eight T. and D. railway shares, according to advice note, at 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* per share; scrip had not issued, and the 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* was premium: deposit of 11*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share first appeared in printed share lists (which were sent daily to plaintiff) on 2nd of September, and 4*l.* 1*s.* deposit was paid by defendants to persons from whom they bought shares; and defendants omitted to charge deposit, and plaintiff, who purchased for other persons, as broker, (though he dealt with defendants as principal,) only charged 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* per share, and had settled with such other persons on that footing before any claim made for deposits. Defendants, also, on 18th of September, bought for plaintiff eighty S.S. railway shares, according to advice notes at 4*l.* 10*s.* per share: that did not include deposit of 2*l.* 10*s.* per share, which first appeared in share lists about 26th of September; and settling with vendors defendants paid them deposits, amounting to 360*l.* in addition to 4*l.* 10*s.* per share; but on 26th of September shares were sold by defendants for plaintiff at 7*l.* per share, which sum included deposits, and plaintiff was credited with full amount: an account furnished to plaintiff by defendants on 2nd of October, and also in subsequent accounts, plaintiff was only debited with 4*l.* 10*s.* per share, and he only debited his principals with that amount, and settled with them on that footing: on 19th of November, defendants, having received letter from plaintiff demanding a balance of 605*l.* 1*4s.* 1*0d.*, discovered mistake with regard to deposits, and immediately acquainted plaintiff with it.—Held, that they were entitled to set off the 200*l.*, and also the 41*l.* 5*s.*, Q.B. 247

Building Society—By rule of Metropolitan Building Association proceedings not to be taken without approbation of majority of members present at "special meeting," and president on receiving written request, signed by twelve members, was to convene "special general meeting."—Action brought with approbation of majority of members present at special general meeting, well brought within meaning of rule. By rule 28, committee to determine "all disputes which may arise respecting construction of rules or any of clauses, matters, or things herein contained," but if decision not satisfactory, reference to be made to arbitration, pursuant to 10 Geo. 4. c. 56. s. 27.—Rule referred only to disputes as to construction of rules, and did not prevent trustees suing for recovery of subscriptions and fines. By rule 11, if committee were satisfied premises offered by any member to whom shares have been awarded, a sufficient security, they are to direct trustees to pay to such member money he is entitled to receive, on his executing deed in trust to sell, or other valid conveyance, mortgage, or assurance.—Society might lend money on mortgage to its own members as well as to strangers. By rule 8, as often as funds amounted to a share or sum of 120*l.*, share was to be awarded to highest bidder, purchaser to have privilege of taking as many additional shares at same rate as he might choose.—Quare—Whether, as society enabled its members to hold unlimited number of shares, each of which might be maximum share, it was within 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 32. s. 2, Ex. 177

A delivery ticket issued by a railway company, as common carriers, described J. as a porter in their employ.—In action brought for non-delivery of goods stolen on their journey by J.,—semble, that company not estopped from giving evidence that J. was not their servant, Ex. 271

Cases—There is no legal obligation upon trespasser to replace what he has pulled down or destroyed upon land of another, though liable in an action of trespass to compensate in damages for loss sustained. Case for breaking and entering a coal mine, before plaintiffs were possessed, and keeping open and unstoppered up an aperture and excavation made therein by defendant, whereby water deluged and damaged plaintiff's mine: pleas, not guilty; and a plea in substance alleging former recovery by an award in former action in respect of such damage and all consequential damages: new assignment that defendant after such recovery kept and continued aperture open and unfilled up, whereby, &c.: plea thereto, former action and award, and averring that grievances newly assigned were merely consequential damages arising to plaintiffs by reason of matters and injuries in declaration in former action alleged: plaintiffs set out award, abique hoc, that damages were consequential arising to plaintiffs by reason of matters and injuries in declaration in former action alleged: at trial it was proved that defendant broke and entered and took away boundary coal; that in 1840 plaintiffs worked mine till they came to place where excavations were made by such breaking and entering, and water came in and had continued to flow in ever since: it further appeared that, in 1841, an action was brought against defendant for breaking and entering above mentioned, and that cause was referred to an arbitrator, and that substantial damages were awarded.—Defendant entitled to verdict on not guilty, and on plea to new assignment, Q.B. 233

—Declaration in case that defendant possessed a wharf on the Thames, near which there was a wood-work, placed there by defendant, and being at bottom of river, and over which after-mentioned ship at certain states of tide would float, but not at other states of tide: that plaintiff possessed of a ship then being by sufferance of defendant at and alongside wharf for reward to defendant in that behalf; that defendant had management and controul of wharf, and mooring and stationing of ships at and near it whilst they were at wharf for purpose of using it: Breach, that defendant unskillfully, &c. placed, moored and stationed plaintiff's ship in river, near wharf and over wood-work, and detained it there for a long and improper time, and until ship, on fall of tide, struck against wood-work, and thereby was greatly injured: Plea, that defendant had not management and controul of wharf, and mooring and stationing of ships, &c. modo et formd.—After verdict for plaintiff, Court refused a rule nisi for arresting judgment, which decision was affirmed on error; and it was held, declaration sufficiently shewed a duty on the part of defendant safely to moor and station the vessel, and a breach of it, Ex. 301

—See Costs. County Court.

Charity. See Parish Lands.

Churchwardens and Overseers—not personally liable for attorney's bill of costs, where copy of rule for mandamus to Justices to hear appeal served on churchwardens, one of whom signed retainer, but afterwards countermanded it; and before rule argued, churchwardens re-elected, and new overseers elected, one of whom often asked about rule; and upon delivery of bill of costs all of them expressed readiness to pay, but said there was a grudge in the parish, Ex. 94

Circuity of Action. See Pleading.

Clergy—Perpetual curate possessed of house and lands in right of his curacy, bound to keep them in repair; and action for dilapidations maintainable by new incumbent against his predecessor, Q.B. 366

Coal Acts. See Pleading. Statute.

Cognovit—Where cognovit, in simple form, given before appearance, and nothing further done for several years, plaintiff entitled to enter an appearance, and proceed on cognovit, notwithstanding Reg. Gen. Hil. term, 4 Will. 4. r. 35, and without obtaining leave of Judge, or giving term's notice, Ex. 4

Commitment—under 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 4. until payment of arrears of poor-rate and costs awarded, is bad, and trespass lies against Justices. Backing

- a warrant a ministerial act only. What damages recoverable. Demand of perusal and copy of warrant signed by plaintiff's attorney though not left by him, sufficient. What sufficient compliance with demand. Constable not entitled to redress merely because sued jointly with the Justices, Ex. 349
- See Master and Servant.
- Common pur cause de voisinage*—Semble, that common pur cause de voisinage may exist between two proprietors of neighbouring farms, independently of any rights of common on either side. But claim of such right by individual, as annexed or incident to a private estate, cannot be good by custom, but must be pleaded as a prescription in a que estate, Q. B. 121
- Company*—Implied authority to borrow money (see Mine), C. P. 17
- See Banking Company. Joint Stock Company. Pleading. Railway.
- Compensation*—Duty of jury under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 38, Act for making Battersea Park, only to estimate value of property taken, and estate and interest, if it appeared to be divided among several persons; and they have no power to decide whether title is in the claimant; and prohibition to restrain recording of verdict affecting title granted, Q. B. 336
- See Railway.
- Condition*—against disputing testator's competency (see Devise), Ex. 106
- Constables*—Appointment of, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 109, (see Slander), Ex. 129
- See Commitment.
- Contract*—By agreement, of 25th of May, defendant agreed to purchase growing crops of plaintiff, price to be paid on 5th of June, valuation to be made by 3rd of June by two persons, one named by each party by 31st of May; and in case either party neglected or refused to nominate a referee within time appointed, referee of other party alone to make final decision. Word "nominate" means not only the choice of referee, but communication of appointment to other party; and appointment by plaintiff of referee on 31st of May, and communication thereof to defendant by letter, which reached him 1st of June, does not entitle plaintiff to proceed ex parte, Q. B. 1
- The meaning of particular words used in, is for the Judge, except there is evidence that they were used in a sense peculiar to particular trade or business, or that their meaning depends on usage of particular place. "Months" prima facie means lunar months, and subsequent conduct of parties to contract inadmissible to shew that it meant calendar months. Quare—As to admissibility of evidence to shew that, by usage of auctioneers, "month" meant calendar month, Q. B. 81
- Declaration by payee against maker of promissory note; plea, that after note had become due it was agreed between plaintiff, defendant, and A. B. that A. B. should, at request of plaintiff, pay to plaintiff in trust for E. B., 200*l.* for her sole use and benefit, or 25*l.* per annum, so long as the 200*l.* should remain unpaid, and that the rights and causes of action of plaintiff upon and in respect of note should be suspended, so long as A. B. should continue to pay the 25*l.*; averment, that A. B. had paid said sum, &c.—On writ of error, plea bad in substance, legal effect of agreement being not to suspend plaintiff's right of action upon the note, but only to subject him to action if he sued contrary to the agreement, Q. B. 114
- A material alteration of a sold note by buyer, without privity of seller, avoids contract. An alteration in a material part of a written contract, without consent of both parties, is a material alteration which avoids contract, although it may not have altered duty of party sought to be charged, C. P. 47
- Plaintiff, by written agreement, undertook to do work to houses of defendant in South Street and Southampton Street: defendant had no houses in Southampton Street.—Construction of agreement was for Judge, and it was not a question for jury whether word "and" inserted by mistake, C. P. 145
- Defendant agreed to supply plaintiff with 150 tons weight of iron girders, at certain price per ton, according to plans to be furnished by plaintiff: within reasonable time fourteen tons weight of girders, for which plans were furnished at same time were ordered: four months after date of agreement fourteen tons were demanded; and orders were given for sixty tons more girders, plans for which were furnished: defendant then repudiated contract.—This an entire contract; and as plaintiff had not furnished plans for whole 150 tons within reasonable time, he could not recover for non-delivery of fourteen for which plans had been furnished within reasonable time, C. P. 155
- By agreement under seal, plaintiff undertook to supply for three years, all such pipes as should, from time to time, during the said period, be required by the company, at certain specified rates: company ordered and had large quantities of pipes in stock when contract expired, for which plaintiff sought to recover difference in price between current value and that paid under contract. Contract not limited to pipes required for use at time of orders; but plaintiff bound to supply all pipes ordered by company for works which they were carrying on and authorized to undertake by their act of parliament, C. P. 237
- Clerk of county court personally liable upon contract made by him with builder, to fit up hall and offices, in which business of court to be transacted, C. P. 304
- between insurance company and plaintiff that plaintiff, as attorney of company, should receive salary of 100*l.* per annum, in lieu of rendering annual bill of costs for general business, &c.; and in consideration that plaintiff had promised to fulfil agreement on his part, company promised to fulfil same on their part, and to retain and employ plaintiff as such attorney:—Held, by Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing judgment of Court of Common Pleas, that agreement created relation of attorney and client, and amounted to promise, on part of defendants, to continue that relation at least for one year, C. P. 307
- Where sufficient consideration disclosed to entitle a party to sue alone, Ex. 36
- H., joint owner with defendant of estates in Berblie, advanced to latter large sums on account of defendant's share of liabilities in respect of those estates, and received on account thereof defendant's acceptance for 3,000*l.* on terms contained in letter by defendant:—"Should the crops (of the estates) not come forward in time to provide for these notes, I shall expect to have them renewed for each period as may be found necessary from the condition of the properties." Crops being and still continuing unproductive, bills were renewed on three several occasions; but ultimately H. refused to renew further. Plaintiff, indorsees of H., with notice of agreement, entitled to recover, as agreement stipulated for one renewal only, Ex. 71
- Declaration that plaintiff was attorney of railway company; that it was intended to apply for act to incorporate same, and in consideration that managing committee of railway would, by permission and at instance of plaintiff, retain defendant as attorney about performing certain business for company, and in, &c. if an act of parliament should be obtained, he, defendant, promised to allow plaintiff one-third part of profits of business: avowment, that managing committee did, with permission and at instance of plaintiff, retain defendant as attorney, &c.: breach, non-payment of third part of profits.—Held, bad, meaning of contract being, that work to be done, and not retainer, was to be contingent upon passing of act, Ex. 246

—In general there is sufficient privity of contract to maintain action if party actually making contract with defendant was acting for plaintiff, and intended at time to make it for him, though defendant was not aware it was made for plaintiff. The name in which contract is made is prima facie evidence of party for whom it was made; but not conclusive (except by custom of trade in case of bills of exchange). Where a banking account was opened in name of one of two plaintiffs they may show that it was opened on behalf of both; but it lies on them to prove this intention affirmatively, and fact that plaintiffs were partners, and that money paid into account belonged to partnership, not alone sufficient evidence to go to jury that contract intended to be made on behalf of the two, Ex. 286

—Where goods are delivered on board ship under bill of lading; captain is in possession and carries for and on behalf of vendor, and delivery does not vest goods in vendee as in case of common carrier, though ship be expressly hired for vendee. Legal meaning of "appropriation" of goods, under contract of sale, and what amounts to an appropriation in law, so as thereby to vest goods in vendee, Ex. 307

—See Assumpsit. Landlord and Tenant. Master and Servant. Principal and Agent. Railway.

Conviction—Maltster by collusion, and to exonerate himself from penalties, procured conviction of servant for same offence he had himself committed, and certificate of Justices which operated as discharge of himself,—conviction quashed, Q.B. 319

—for assault directing penalty to be paid to treasurer of county, bad, C.P. 176

—See Master and Servant.

Copyhold—Reversionary grant, by rector and lord of manor of B, of copyhold premises, comprising, in one aggregate holding and at one aggregate undivided rent, three ancient tenements, originally held of manor, under distinct grants and at distinct rents. Same rector afterwards sells and conveys reversionary fee, under powers in Land Tax Redemption Act, to redeem portion of land tax on living, and sale is confirmed by Land Tax Commissioners under that act. In ejectment by subsequent rector to recover the premises, title of defendant, who claims under parliamentary sale and conveyance, cannot be impeached, on ground that sale was of a reversion expectant on a void grant, Ex. 1

Copyright—Plaintiff was original composer of music of narrative character, which he sang publicly for profit and accompanied by gesture and expression: defendant announced, by handbills, performance of and performed plaintiff's song at Crosby Hall, licensed for music and dancing under 25 Geo. 2. c. 36. In action for penalties under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45,—held, first, that plaintiff's song was a musical composition within section 20. of that act. Secondly, that Crosby Hall was a place of dramatic entertainment within 3 Will. 4. c. 15. Thirdly, that an allegation in declaration in terms of statute, that plaintiff had "sole liberty of representing a certain musical composition," was sufficient statement of plaintiff's right. Fourthly, that it was not necessary that plaintiff, who was assignee of copyright of words, should be registered under section 14. before bringing action, Q.B. 225

—An alien lawyer, author of a work first published in England, has a copyright in it whether composed in this country or abroad. Contemporaneous publication abroad does not defeat copyright here. Copyright was sold by letter to plaintiff, which was a valid sale by law of country where it was made.—Plaintiff an "assign" of the author, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. ss. 2, 3, and as such entitled to copyright, C.P. 273

Coroner. See Quo Warranto.

Corporation—In April 1839, prior to grant of separate Court of Quarter Sessions to borough of Birmingham, situate within county of Warwick, a resolution was come to, for paying 11d. per head per day for one year, for maintenance of borough prisoners in county gaol, there being no gaol in borough, and this was agreed to by county Justices. In September 1839, after grant of Court of Quarter Sessions, account made out and allowed on above principle. In January 1841 county Justices resolved that borough Justices had no power to commit to county gaol, and such prisoners were detained at expense and inconvenience to borough, till county Justices could attend to commit them. In consequence of doubts as to validity of charter of borough of B, no other accounts were sent in, in reference to above charges, till September 1842, when an account was sent in to council charging for prisoners confined in gaol at rate of 11d. per head up to 30th of June 1842. Statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98. passed on 10th of August 1842.—In pursuance of that statute such accounts rightly altered, so as to charge actual expense of borough prisoners instead of 11d. per head per day; statute rendering borough liable to actual expenses, both prospectively and retrospectively, and no deduction could be made in respect of prisoners committed by borough Justices to county gaol, subsequently to January 1841. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 110. provides that gaol of city of Coventry shall be a gaol of county of Warwick, to be purchased and paid for by county out of monies in hands of treasurer.—Borough of Birmingham, which had separate Court of Quarter Sessions, liable to pay its proportion of county rate for purchase of gaol, Q.B. 85

—See Arbitration.

Costs—Defendant pleaded non assumpsit to all but 12*l.* To 11*l.* parcel of 12*l.* payment and acceptance in satisfaction, after action brought. To residue, payment of 1*l.* into court. Plaintiff traversed payment of the 11*l.*, and took the 1*l.* out of court. Amount due to plaintiff at commencement of suit did not exceed 12*l.*, and 11*l.* was paid after action brought, and accepted by defendant in satisfaction of that amount. Plaintiff, after payment of the 1*l.*, not entitled to proceed for costs, in respect of the 11*l.*; but defendant entitled to have verdict entered for him, and to general costs of action, Q.B. 29

—of Chancery suit not recoverable in action at law (see Vendor and Purchaser), Q.B. 85

—A cause was called on for trial; and after jury were sworn it was discovered that record did not contain a similitur to one of the replications, nor any award of venire; defendants withheld their consent to an amendment, and Judge discharged the jury:—Defendants not entitled to costs of the day, Q.B. 113

—Judgment for, where plaintiff ought to have sued in court of requests, erroneous (see Writ of Error), Q.B. 137

—The 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 129, which prohibits plaintiff recovering costs in an action brought in a superior court, for which a plaint might have been entered in county court, applies to actions on nego-

tible instruments. Upon application to enter suggestion to deprive plaintiff of costs under that section, defendant need not aver that Judge did not grant certificate that cause was fit to be tried in superior court, Q.B. 179

Costs (continued)—A cause in Lord Mayor's Court (goods having been attached) was removed into Queen's Bench, and defendant paid money into court in lieu of bail: he then obtained order for plaintiff, who lived in Scotland, to give security for costs, with usual stay of proceedings. After long delay, defendant entitled to rule calling on plaintiff to put in security within a limited time, and, on default, to have money paid out of court, Q.B. 215

— The general rule that an unsuccessful party must pay costs, applicable to cases where party, who has obtained erroneous decision in his favour at Quarter Sessions, unsuccessfully opposes mandamus to correct it. Court, however, may, exercising its general jurisdiction, make an exception under particular circumstances. Scrabble—If no opposition were offered costs would not be incurred, Q.B. 272

— Right to proceed for, in action of debt after payment in satisfaction (see Debt), Q.B. 339

— In action for infringement of patent, plaintiff obtained verdict. New trial granted; but before second trial, plaintiff insolvent.—Court refused to order plaintiff to give security for costs, as it could not be fairly presumed that action adopted and promoted by assignees, C.P. 109

— Administrators no right to, upon consent rule in ejectment (see Ejectment), C.P. 147

— To deprive plaintiff of costs under section 129, of County Court Act, defendant must shew affirmatively that case not within exceptions in section 128, C.P. 212

— Defendant must also shew that he dwelt or carried on his business, at time of action brought, within jurisdiction of county court; and it is not sufficient that cause of action arose within jurisdiction, C.P. 221

— To deprive plaintiff of costs under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, a 129, defendant must shew cause of action arose wholly or in some material point within jurisdiction of county court within which defendant dwelt or carried on business at time of action brought, C.P. 248

— Declaration containing four counts: defendant pleaded general issue to the whole, and special pleas to each count: verdict for defendant on general issue to first, third, and fourth counts and on all other issues for plaintiff: judgment on second count (upon which plaintiff succeeded), arrested.—Defendant was entitled to general costs of cause. James v. Brook overruled, C.P. 277

— The Court will entertain motion for leave to enter a suggestion to deprive plaintiff of costs, upon affidavits of new and material facts, though leave has been refused by a Judge, on ground that affidavits produced were insufficient. The City of London Local Court Act gives a concurrent jurisdiction to the superior courts "where the plaintiff dwells more than twenty miles from the defendant."—That means twenty miles from place where defendant dwells. An affidavit stating that defendant carried on business at No. 133, Fenchurch Street, in city of London, does not sufficiently shew defendant's dwelling-place to entitle him to suggestion to deprive plaintiff of costs. Court, however, gave leave to suggest that plaintiff did not live more than twenty miles from place where defendant carried on business, C.P. 290

— To trespass in three closes, A, B, and C, in one count, defendant pleaded public way over all three, and other pleas of justification; plaintiff traversed all pleas except so much of plea of public way as related to close C, as to which he new assigned trespasses extra viam. Jury found for defendant on plea of public way over closes A. and B, and for plaintiff on not guilty to new assignment, with a farthing damages: other pleas all found for plaintiff. No certificate under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24. Trespasses in three closes divisible causes of action; and plaintiff entitled under 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, ss. 4. and 5. to costs of issues found for him as to closes A. and B, on which he had failed; but under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24. entitled to no costs in respect of close C, on which he had succeeded, but had recovered less than 40s. damages. Effect of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24. combined with 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, ss. 4. and 5. as construed by decided cases is that plaintiff is in better condition by bringing action, in which he fails altogether, than by bringing a frivolous one in which he succeeds. Defendant when he succeeds is punished by one statute if he improperly plead pleas which he cannot support, and plaintiff when he succeeds is punished by other statute if he brings a frivolous action, Ex. 32

— Debt for goods sold; pleas as to all but 15s., parcel, &c., assumpsit indebitatus; as to that sum, payment into court of 15s. Replication, similiter to first plea; to second, that plaintiff accepts the 15s. in full satisfaction and discharge of cause of action in introductory part of that plea mentioned, with prayer of judgment for his costs sustained in that behalf. Jury found defendants never indebted to plaintiff to greater amount than 15s.—Plaintiff entitled to costs, on replication to second plea, Ex. 74

— The 129th section of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, which deprives parties of costs who, after its passing, sue in superior courts for causes "for which a plaintiff might have been entered in any court holden under that act," does not apply where action is commenced after act passed, but before Order in Council establishing county court in district where cause of action arose, &c. Ex. 101

— The Queen, by Order in Council, directed that Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, should be put in force in every county on 15th of March 1847: on 25th of March following an action was commenced in Court of Exchequer for cause of action within jurisdiction of County Court of Kingston; but there was not then in existence at that place any county court, at which a plaintiff could have been entered.—Plaintiff, who had recovered a verdict for 40s., entitled to costs, Ex. 131

— A rule was made absolute for entering suggestion depriving plaintiff of costs, and for his paying defendant his costs of suit. The suggestion was traversed by plaintiff. As the costs of suit depended upon trial of suggestion, Court had no power by rule to compel plaintiff to pay them, Ex. 205

— To obtain leave to enter suggestion under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, a 129, it is sufficient if affidavit brings case within sections 128, and 129; it need not negative any grounds for refusing suggestion not mentioned in those sections; if they exist they are to be shewn by other party. If a prima facie case be made out Court will not inquire into doubtful point of law, which may be raised upon record after suggestion entered. Leave to enter suggestion granted in action on bill of exchange in which plaintiff had recovered less than 20l.; and quære—Whether bills of exchange are within jurisdiction of county courts, Ex. 265

— See Attorney. Bankruptcy. Malicious Prosecution.

County Court.—Tenant, after notice to quit, refused to deliver up possession of premises: plaintiff entered and summons issued out of county court, under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 122.—The fact of tenant appearing and shewing cause, not sufficient to oust county court of its jurisdiction to grant warrant of possession; it is for that Court to determine whether the cause shewn is sufficient or not. Decision of county court conclusive upon question, whether tenancy "duly determined by a legal notice to quit." Q.B. 161

— Judge of county court has no power to alter verdict in cause tried by jury. After trial and entry of judgment for defendants, they left the court; and, subsequently, and, as defendants swore they believed, after Court had broken up, Judge rescinded his decision, and ordered new trial, when he gave judgment for plaintiff: affidavits in answer did not shew affirmatively when alteration made, but copy of entry in register was produced, in which it was stated to have been at the same court.—Judge exceeded his jurisdiction, and prohibition granted, Q.B. 170

— The sufficiency of proof of service of a summons entirely a question for discretion of Judge of the county court, and a superior court will not interfere by prohibition, where he has exercised such discretion. Semble.—That due service under the rule of practice is not a condition precedent to jurisdiction of county court, Q.B. 174

— On motion for new trial of plaintiff, tried by Judge alone, Judge ordered second trial to be had before a jury, costs of motion to be paid to opposing party.—Opposing party, having accepted those costs, could not afterwards object to the order, Q.B. 183

— Summons out of county court described defendant as executor of A. B. and on his appearance, plaintiff opened the case against him as executor of C. D.: cause of action accrued in 1842: Judge directed a fresh summons to be issued, describing defendant as executor of C. D. bearing same date as first summons, in order to save Statute of Limitations.—Queen's Bench refused to interfere, Q.B. 230

— Jurisdiction of county court not ousted by mere claim of title: Judge is to inquire and decide whether title really in question; but decision not final, and if superior Court be satisfied that title in question, prohibition will be granted, Q.B. 357

— Refusal of prohibition to Judge of, where, notwithstanding an admission by plaintiff that plea of judgment recovered in another court for the same debt was true, judgment was given for the plaintiff, C.P. 16

— Declaration on replevin bond for not prosecuting suit with effect, according to condition, that plaintiff made his plaint at Whitechapel County Court, and "that it was adjudged by the said Court that the said plaintiff should take nothing by his said plaint:" plea, nil tiel record: replication, there is such a record: The order made in county court minute book was, "struck out for want of jurisdiction, a disputed title having been sworn to."—Entry did not support declaration, and defendant entitled to judgment, C.P. 190

— Jurisdiction of county court not excluded in action of trespass qu. cl. fr., by claim of defendant, as inhabitant of B., to enter plaintiff's land for purpose of asserting right of fishing there; custom for all inhabitants of B., as such, to enter plaintiff's close and take fish there without limit, being bad; and right claimed under it not a hereditament, and therefore not within proviso in 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. c. 58, C.P. 206

— The term "cause of action" in 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 63. means cause of one action, and is not limited to an action on one separate contract: that definition, however, does not embrace all contracts executed, however unconnected and dissimilar in character, which could be included in one indebitatus count: but applies certainly to cases of tradesmen's bills, in which one item is connected with another, in the sense that dealing was not intended to terminate with one contract, but to be continuous, so that one item, if not paid, should be united with another, and form an entire demand.

Quere.—Whether that section applies to all debts which can be comprised in one description in one count, ex. gr. "for goods sold." Certain alleged agents of defendant had given to several persons tickets for goods, which were to be supplied by plaintiff, who had brought 228 actions in county court against defendant, in respect thereof, upon claims none of which exceeded 5*l.*, and many fell short of 20*s.*, the whole amounting to 303*l.* 19*s.*—Prohibition granted. Quere.—Whether it would have been granted if the whole of the claims had amounted to 20*l.* only, and items had been sued for by separate plaints, Ex. 157

— A local act of parliament imposed rates one half on landlords, other half on tenants; and enacted, that tenants should first pay whole rate and deduct a moiety out of rent, and that every landlord should allow of such deduction "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary:" after the passing of this act certain premises in the parish were leased, tenant covenanting to pay all rates and taxes; landlord refused to deduct half the rate, and tenant served him with a plaint from the county court. The Court refused a prohibition, "the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments," within 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 58. not being in question; and semble, per Parks, B.,—the local act did not apply to agreements entered into subsequently to its passing, Ex. 168

— Defendant was sued in county court, and without any notice thereof, judgment was given against him and his goods seized in execution: he then applied to Judge under the 80th section of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. to set aside judgment and execution; but Judge having imposed certain terms, he declined to accede to them, and paid debt and costs under protest.—Judge had jurisdiction over matter, and prohibition refused, Ex. 174

— A certiorari to remove plaint may issue ex parte, and without notice to the other party, if the Judge, in exercise of his discretion, thinks proper to grant leave, under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 90, Ex. 247

— Quere.—As to jurisdiction of, in actions on bills of exchange, Ex. 265

— See Attorney. Costs.

Court of Requests. See Writ of Error.

Covenant.—A., by indenture, demise to B. certain land, and B. covenanted for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, to build certain houses thereupon within two years; B. underlet to C., and covenanted for himself, and his heirs, executors, and administrators, to observe and perform, or effectually to indemnify C. against covenants in first indenture; B. assigned his reversion to D. A having entered and ejected C. by reason of non-performance of first-mentioned covenant.—Held, that B.'s covenant with C. did not run with the land, and D. was not liable to C., Q.B. 111

— Lease contained proviso that on notice being given by lessee eighteen months before end of eighth year, and all arrears of rent being paid, and all covenants and agreements on part of lessee having been observed and performed, lease should determine at end of eighth year; "nevertheless, without prejudice to any claim or remedy which any of the parties hereto may then be entitled to for breach of any of the covenants or agreements here-inbefore contained."—Performance of all covenants by lessee a condition precedent to right to determine lease, notwithstanding concluding clause. In action by lessor on lease declaration alleged specific breaches of covenant, and lessee pleaded that he gave eighteen months' notice to determine lease at end of eighth year, and that at expiration of that year all arrears of rent had been paid, and all covenants and agreements on part of lessee had been observed and performed, and thereupon lease determined; and plaintiff replied, setting out specific breach of covenant assigned in declaration, abique hoc that all covenants and agreements on part of lessee had been observed and performed by him at end of eighth year, concluding to country.—Plaintiff may put defendant on proof of his averment in general terms in which it was made, and replication properly concluded to country, Q.B. 301

—Declaration in covenant that plaintiff and defendant had agreed to enter into partnership as surgeons, &c. until January 1, 1846, and that it was further agreed that plaintiff should after that time introduce defendant to his patients as his successor in business, &c.; in consideration whereof defendant covenanted to pay 50*l.* on 25th of March 1846, in addition to another sum covenanted to be paid: Breach, non-payment of the 50*l.* Plea, that after 1st of January 1846, and before 25th of March 1846, plaintiff refused to introduce defendant as plaintiff's successor to, &c., wherefore defendant refused to pay said sum of 50*l.*, verification.—Introduction to patients an independent covenant, and not a condition precedent to payment of 50*l.*; and plea bad, Ex. 172

—Plaintiff and defendant, attorneys and solicitors in co-partnership, dissolved partnership by indenture, whereby defendant covenanted with plaintiff that defendant would not thereafter, within next seven years, directly or indirectly, by himself or in partnership, carry on business of attorney or solicitor within fifty miles from Ely Place, nor interfere with, solicit or influence clients of said co-partnership; and if he should infringe covenant, he would immediately pay to plaintiff 1,000*l.* as and for liquidated damages, and not by way of penalty. Intention of parties was, that 1,000*l.* was to be considered as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty, Ex. 226

—Agreement under seal, dated 27th of April 1843, as follows—that sum of 60*l.* shall remain in hands of J. H. from date hereof for one whole year; that at expiration of that period (if interest shall be then paid, and no notice be then given to call in same,) 60*l.* shall continue in hands of J. H. for another year, and so on from year to year, until notice in writing shall be given by W. B. to call in same; that twelve calendar months' notice in writing shall be given to call in the 60*l.*, and that at expiration of notice, same shall be paid by instalments of 10*l.* every third month, until whole amount be paid, first payment of 10*l.* to be made at expiration of fifteen months from date of notice, so that whole amount of 60*l.* shall be paid by end of two years and six months from date of notice.—Held, (Platt, B. dissentiente), that notice to pay principal sum might be given at any period of year, and that time of payment of instalments was to be calculated from date of notice, and not from end of current year under agreement, Ex. 278

—By indenture between plaintiff and defendants, plaintiff sold letters patent to defendants, and defendants covenanted to pay by instalments: provided, that if within twelve months from date of indenture defendants should disapprove of patent, and of their disapprobation and intention to sell it should give notice to plaintiff, payment of instalments should be suspended; and if defendants should within six months after notice sell patent, and retaining to themselves 246*l.* pay over surplus to plaintiff, covenant for payment of entire sum should cease: but if defendants having given such notice should neglect or refuse to observe all other matters or things in proviso, covenant for payment of 840*l.* should stand.—Defendants not having actually sold liable to pay instalments though they had given notice, and were ready and willing and had endeavoured to sell, Ex. 305

—Declaration that by indenture plaintiff conveyed all coals and mines of coal within and under certain premises to defendant, who covenanted to pay 40*l.* for every statute acre of coal; and that he would, till consideration money paid, pay 40*l.* part, &c. annually by half-yearly instalments, commencing from date of indenture, whether a whole acre should have been gotten in any such year or not: averment that at time of making indenture there had been, and still was, coal within and under premises, and that two half-yearly instalments were in arrear.—On error, declaration good, and finding of coal not a condition precedent to payment, Ex. 367

—Where A. covenanted with B. & C, their executors, administrators, and assigns, to pay money, to be held by them on certain trusts, and C. did not assent to or execute deed, and subsequently by indenture, to which neither A. nor B. were parties, disclaimed all trusts of covenant, B. could not alone sue A. upon covenant during lifetime of C, Ex. 338

Debt—Where after action brought debt is paid and accepted in satisfaction, and costs are offered but refused, damage merely nominal independently of costs, and plaintiff cannot proceed for costs.—To action on cheque for 25*l.* plea of payment of 60*l.*, after action brought, in satisfaction of debt, damages, and costs: it was proved that after action brought defendant paid cheque, and offered to pay any costs, which offer plaintiff refused. Defendant entitled to verdict on the plea. Q.B. 339

—Quare—Whether since 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. s. 26, debt lies for arrears of a rent in fee. But where a party covenanted that he would duly pay certain yearly chief rents,—held, that debt would lie for arrears thereof, Ex. 289

—on simple contract, does not lie where money secured by mortgage had been further secured by bond, though after sale under mortgage defendant admitted correctness of amount and promised to pay it, Ex. 355

Dead—or other writing speaks from its execution, and not from day of its date, Q.B. 49

—Delivery presumed where document proved, or admitted, to be signed and sealed, Q.B. 317

—which may operate either at common law or under Statute of Uses, must, in pleading, be taken to operate at common law, unless there is an express averment of an election that it shall operate under statute. Quare—Whether an entry by lessee under such a deed will not be conclusive of an election that it shall operate at common law. Semble—That, under a grant to A, B, and C, their executors, &c. of liberty to get coals under certain closes until all coals in said closes should be gotten, an interest passes to executors of survivor, if deed operates under Statute of Uses, Ex. 110

De injuriâ. See Pleading.

Demurrer—to declaration by indorsee against acceptor of bill of exchange, that it did not sufficiently shew days of grace had elapsed before action, frivolous, Q.B. 7 — to declaration on ground that defendant described as "William Henry W. Collier," the initial letter W. being used for an unexpressed name,—not frivolous, C.P. 91

— Where frivolous, Ex. 8

Detinue—In detinue for detention of railway scrip re-delivered to plaintiff after action brought and before verdict, jury may as measure of damages take into consideration difference between value of scrip at time of demand and at time of re-delivery. In such case a subsequent delivery being impossible, jury may find facts specially, and so confine themselves to an assessment of damages. Form of judgment may be simply that plaintiff do recover his said damages and costs, C.P. 82

Devise—A will is to be construed so as to reconcile words primâ facie repugnant. Testator devised certain freeholds by name to his wife for life, remainder to A. in fee; and also devised to his wife in fee "all his real and personal estates both freehold and copyhold, and now surrendered to the uses of my will."—Word "all" to be read "all the residue" to satisfy testator's intention: and A. on death of wife took remainder in fee in estates first devised, Q.B. 119

—"I give, devise, and bequeath all my real and personal estate, monies, securities for money, and all other my real and personal estate of what nature or kind soever, and wheresoever the same may be, which I am now possessed of, or which at any time hereafter I may be possessed of, or entitled unto, subject to the payment of all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the expense of proving this my will, unto my dear wife, to and for her sole and separate use and benefit," gives devise an estate in fee in lands of testator, Ex. 51

— of lands to P. M., testator's brother, for life, remainder to use of first son of P. M. for life; remainder to use of first son of said first son and his heirs male; and in default of such issue, to use of all and every other the son and sons of P. M. severally and successively for like interests and limitations as before directed with respect to first son of P. M. and his issue; and in default of issue of P. M., or in case of his not leaving any at his decease, then over. P. M. never had issue:—All the limitations subsequent to that to use of first son of P. M. void for remoteness; and if P. M. had had sons they would not by application of cy-pres doctrine have taken an estate tail, inasmuch as by such construction estate would devolve in line of succession different from that expressly designated by testator, Ex. 81

— Testator by will duly executed to pass real estate, gave considerable interests in his real estate to his daughter, and, subject thereto, gave his property to her children, &c.; proviso, that if testator's said daughter, or her husband, or any person or persons on her, or his, or their behalf, should dispute the will or his competency to make it, or should refuse to confirm it so far as he or she lawfully could, when required by the executors to do so, the disposition in favour of daughter should be revoked:—Held, a good and valid condition in law, Ex. 106

— Word "estate" in operative part of will passes not only the corpus of property, but all testator's interest in it, unless controuled by context: and neither do superadded words of local description more applicable to corpus of property, nor words apparently explanatory of meaning of term in devise itself, prevent it from passing whole interest: but where word "estate" not used in operative clause of devise itself, but introduced in another part of will referring to it, it cannot be construed as extending operative clause, whether prior or subsequent.—Words "who have issue" construed to mean who have when will takes effect, and not applicable to children born after testator's death, Ex. 337

— Devise of three several estates to testator's three daughters, M, C, and L, for their respective lives, remainder to their children as tenants in common in fee, provided "that if any or either of my said daughters shall depart this life without having lawful issue of her body or bodies, that then and in that case the property hereinbefore given to such daughter so dying shall go and accrue to the survivors or survivor of my said daughters, their heirs," &c., "in equal shares and proportions as tenants in common; and if all my daughters, except one, should depart this life without having lawful issue, then that the share of such daughters so dying shall go to the survivor of my said daughter, her heirs and assigns for ever." C died October 3, 1841, leaving a son; and on the 25th L. died without having had issue. On 22nd of December M. and her husband conveyed to trustee property devised to her for life, and also that devised to L, to hold to use of M. for joint lives of herself and her husband, with remainder to survivor in fee:—Word "survivor," in will, read in its ordinary sense, and upon death of L. estate devised to her for life vested absolutely in M. in fee. Son of C. could not, under any contingency, become entitled to any interest in property devised to M. Under will and conveyance husband of M. in her right, had estate in possession during joint lives of himself and his wife, Ex. 331

— A corporation, seized in fee of locus in quo, by indenture of 17th of February 1800, demised same to H. for term of lives and years. By indenture of 23rd of July 1803, H. assigned to C, to secure payment of 1,200*l.* lent by C. to H. By indenture of 9th of February 1804, reciting former indentures, and also that H. had agreed to sell part of land to M. and W. for a sum, out of which sum due from H. should be paid to C, C. bargained, sold, assigned, and transferred, and H. granted, bargained, sold, assigned, and transferred to M. and W. part of demised premises, together with right of way. In 1812 H. died, having made his will, whereby, after bequeathing his estates to his wife for life, he devised same, after her death, to J. and M. in manner following, "upon trust to pay and apply the rents, issues, and profits of the same to and for the life and benefit of my daughter Mary and her assigns during her life, and independent of her present or any future husband; and from and after the decease of my said daughter, I give, devise, and bequeath my real and household estates as aforesaid, unto and equally among all and every the children of my said daughter Mary, share and share alike, as tenants in common." In 1816 wife of H. died. By indenture of 11th of December 1817, corporation assigned to trustees reversion in fee simple of locus in quo. Trustees took only an estate during life of Mary, that lease for lives did not merge in grant of reversion. Under rejoinder ne granta pas, facts of grant only in issue, and seisin admitted, Ex. 370

— Relpelin : avowry, that A. held land, as tenant to B. under demise, subject to certain rents, provisions, conditions and stipulations, inter alia, that H. should not during continuance of tenancy sell any hay off premises, under penalty of 2s. 6d. for each yard of hay so sold, to be recovered by distress as for rent in arrear : averment of sale of 800 yards of hay by A, contrary to said stipulation, by reason whereof 2s. 6d. per yard became due to B ; non-payment thereof ; and distress for same : Plea, non tenet : Verdict for the defendant, and judgment under 17 Car. 2. c. 7, and Court of Queen's Bench, on error, affirmed judgment.—On error, brought upon that judgment Court of Exchequer Chamber decided that sum distrained for not being rent service, judgment under 17 Car. 2. c. 7. was erroneous although after verdict avowry might have sustained judgment for defendant at common law. Court no power under circumstances to give judgment for defendant pro retorno habendo at common law, but could simply reverse judgment, Q.B. 291

Ecclesiastical Law—Under 25 Hen. 8. c. 20. s. 5, after election of a bishop by dean and chapter of cathedral church by virtue of congé d'élire and letters missive, person so elected is to be reputed and taken by name of lord elected of the see, and the king is thereupon to issue letters patent to archbishop commanding him to confirm election, and to invest and consecrate him, and if he fail to do so for twenty days he is to incur penalties of promoveance.—Held, by Lord Denman, C.J. and Erle, J., that archbishop acting merely ministerially is bound to confirm bishop elect, and has no authority to hear any opposition advanced against person so elected : per Patteson, J. and Coleridge, J., that confirmation a judicial act, which archbishop is to conduct according to principles of canon law, and parties opposing are entitled to appear in his court and enter their objections. Also, per Patteson, J. and Coleridge, J., that opposers not having been allowed to appear and be heard, there was a declining of jurisdiction by archbishop, for which a mandamus would lie, Q.B. 253

— Two of three females, coparceners in tail, suffered recoveries, but third did not : all married, and husbands entered into agreement for partition by deed of lands held in co-parcenary, but for nothing more : no such deed had been executed, but lands had been held according to agreement from its date. In action by heir in tail of parcener who did not suffer a recovery, within twenty years after her death, and before 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, to recover her share from husband of one of other co-parceners.—Possession was under agreement, and not adverse. — Notice to tenant in possession to appear in next term but one, insufficient, C.P. 176

— A. (tenant in tail) made a lease for years to B. not conformable to 32 Hen. 8. c. 28 : A. died, and C. next tenant in tail in remainder applied to B. to attorn, and after some negotiation, refused to pay any rent, because D. was entitled to estate.—B. did not become tenant to C, and C. could maintain ejectment against B. without notice to quit ; that confession of entry in consent rule sufficient foundation to support ejectment ; and that setting up D.'s title amounted to disclaimer of C.'s title, C.P. 268

Feigned Issue. See Lunatic.

Felony—The first count of an indictment charged a stealing in dwelling-house of D. above 5*l.*; second count charged simple larceny of monies of D: jury process was to try "whether prisoners are guilty of felony aforesaid;" record stated that jury found prisoners were "guilty of felony aforesaid:" judgment of transportation for ten years. Grant—A ren-charge, with power of distress, cannot be created except by a grant binding some legal interest in land, and ceases to exist when person who is owner of rent becomes entitled to the whole legal estate in land out of which it issues. Interest of mortgagor in possession not a legal estate at all, and cannot support rent-charge with powers of distress. Grant, purporting to be grant of rent-charge, with power to distrain, made by persons having no legal estate in land, may operate as an irrevocable licence by grantor to seize goods on land at time grantee seizes, and to treat them as a distress, and may therefore justify seizure of goods of grantor himself, and give grantee an interest in them after seizure; but it does not give any interest in goods of grantor before seizure, and does not justify seizure of goods of third persons at all: therefore, in trespass de bonis asportatis by assignees of bankrupt, plea setting forth indenture or mortgage of copyholds in fee, by which mortgagor granted that mortgagee might distrain for arrears of interest; and averring surrender and admission of mortgagee in pursuance of it, and justifying seizure of goods on premises, whilst still in possession of bankrupt, but after bankruptcy, as a distress,—held bad after verdict, Ex. 258

Guarantee—B. gave A. this memorandum in writing:

—"In consideration of your agreeing to supply S. with goods upon credit (the amount to be in your discretion), I hereby guarantee you the due payment of such sum as he may now, or at any time and from time to time hereafter, owe you. My liability under this guarantee is to be limited to principal sum in running account of 100*l.*": declaration thereon, that confiding in B.'s said promise A. did afterwards supply S. with goods amounting to 85*l.*; that S, though requested, had not paid for the same, of all which B. had notice: breach, non-payment by B. on request, of 85*l.* On general demurrer, declaration good without an averment of reasonable notice of goods having been supplied; and guarantee disclosed sufficient consideration for B.'s promise, C.P. 209

— The following was signed and delivered by defendant to plaintiff in exchange for an indenture afterwards executed by plaintiff:—"In consideration of your having, by indenture, agreed to accept payment of the debt owing to you by A. B, by the following instalments, that is to say, 10*l.* in the pound, on the 18th day of August next, &c., I promise to guarantee the payment of the instalments." True construction was, that defendant made his promise in consideration that plaintiff would execute an indenture, and release A. B; and, consequently,

- execution of instrument not an admission by defendant that plaintiff had released A. B. and furnished no evidence of his having done so, Ex. 283

This means General Quarter Sessions for county, and not any adjournment thereof; and where Sessions held on certain fixed days at different places for different divisions of a county, but on each by adjournment from preceding, the four weeks under 85th section, and the ten days' notice of appeal required under 88th section, must be reckoned with reference to commencement of sessions for first division, though highway not situate within such division, Q.B. 217

- Inkeeper*. See Lien.
- Insolvent*—Defendant, taken in execution upon a judgment, obtained interim order for protection, under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, and afterwards attended upon his first examination before commissioner, who dismissed his petition under 24th section, upon ground of debt having been fraudulently contracted. Defendant not being then in custody, commissioner did not make any order remanding defendant to his former custody, and defendant being at large, was afterwards, on 20th of August, taken in execution upon a fresh ca. sa. upon same judgment.—Motion made on 6th of November to set aside this writ, and to discharge defendant out of custody, too late. Under 6th section of statute plaintiff authorized in taking defendant in execution upon same judgment. Semble—First, this the correct form of process to use. Secondly, under circumstances commissioner had power to make an order remanding defendant to his former custody, Q.B. 45
- Right of official assignee of insolvent, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. s. 1, to sue in his own name for outstanding debt due to insolvent, Q.B. 50
- A provisional assignee, in whom a prisoner's estate and effects are vested by order of Insolvent Debtors Court, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 37, has power, where such prisoner is a beneficed clergyman, to apply for sequestration under section 55, Q.B. 57
- Debt: Plea, set-off: Replication, that after set-off became due, plaintiff, by order of Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors, was duly discharged, according to a certain act of parliament made and passed in first and second years of her Majesty, intitled, &c., from said set-off; without this, that said order and discharge still remains in full force.—Order and adjudication and discharge a legal answer to plea of set-off, if properly pleaded; but section 91. of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, which allows discharge to be "pleaded generally," only applies to a plea, and replication bad in form, for not sufficiently shewing that plaintiff entitled to his discharge under the statute, C.P. 185
- A final order under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. is an absolute bar to an action for the debt as to which it is a protection. In debt, defendant pleaded that after accruing of debt, and after 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, and before 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, and before commencement of suit, &c., petition for protection from process was duly presented by defendant to Court of Bankruptcy, and afterwards filed; and that after 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, a final order for protection and distribution was made in matter of petition, by Commissioner of Court of Bankruptcy; and that debt accrued before filing of petition.—Plea good both in form and substance, Ex. 249

- Insurance*—Whether terms in condition of policy "commit suicide" include all cases of voluntary self-destruction whether felonious or not, or require that party shall die by his own voluntary act, being then able to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act so as to be a responsible moral agent, C.P. 2
- Policy on a vessel at and from Liverpool to ports and places in China and Manilla, all or any, during ship's stay there for any purposes, and from thence to her port or ports of calling and discharge in the United Kingdom, with liberty to call and stay at all or any ports or places on either side of and at Cape of Good Hope: the vessel sailed direct from Liverpool to a port in China, having on board a cargo for that port, and also for Manilla: she discharged portion of cargo at a port in China, and thence proceeded to Manilla, where she discharged remainder: at Manilla captain took on board on freight 230 chests of opium for Tongkoo, and sailed from Manilla (vessel not being a tenth part laden), intending to seek there a freight back to England, and whilst sailing towards Tongkoo vessel was by perils of sea totally lost: Tongkoo is out of regular course from Manilla to England.—Held, and affirmed in error, that sailing from Manilla to Tongkoo not a deviation; words in policy meaning not "from Manilla" only, but "from ports or places in China and Manilla, all or any," Ex. 135

Interest—on judgment for costs of nonsuit (see Execution), C.P. 288

Irregularity—Where plaintiff obtained verdict upon writ of trial, and Judge at chambers instead of staying execution ordered verdict to be set aside on account of irregularity of notice of trial,—order not a nullity, but irregular, Ex. 52

— See Pleading. Practice. Variance.

Issuable Plea—Plea to declaration on bill for 20*l.*, drawn by L. accepted by defendant, and indorsed by L. to plaintiffs, that before indorsement by L. L. was indebted to defendant in 1*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, and that L. held bills on terms that said debt should be set off against sum due from defendant to L. upon bill; that L. in order to deprive defendant of his right of set-off in respect of 1*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, and in fraud of defendant, and in collusion with plaintiffs, indorsed bill to plaintiffs, who were suing as agents for L., not an issuable plea, Ex. 28

— A plea bad only on special demurrer not non-issuable, Ex. 169

Joint-Stock Company—Plaintiff obtained judgment against joint-stock company, and gave notice to shareholder that application would be made to Court or a Judge for leave to issue execution against him; and a summons was taken out and dismissed before Judge at chambers. Notice exhausted, and no further application could be made on same notice, C.P. 305

— In an action ex contractu against a joint-stock company, completely registered under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, plaintiff must prove a contract made by persons having authority from all the shareholders to bind them. Plaintiff is not confined to proof of authority conferred by the deed; but it is not enough to shew that contract was made or sanctioned by some of directors, without proving that by the deed or otherwise shareholders had authorized that number to act for them. Where the deed of a company appointed eleven directors and declared that five should be a quorum,—Company not bound by contracts made at a board meeting by three only. The company cannot object that contract not in writing, signed by two directors, and under seal of company, or signed by an officer of company; but it may object that persons making contract had no authority at all to bind the whole shareholders. Semble—That acts and admissions by a competent number of governing body of company are admissible as evidence against company, and have same legal effect as if made by company itself, Ex. 252

Judgment as in Case of Nonsuit—Action against four defendants; two died before issue joined, and issue was joined against two survivors; plaintiff neglected to make up record and proceed to trial. Surviving defendants not entitled to judgment as in case of nonsuit unless the deaths of their co-defendants appeared by suggestion on record. Semble—If plaintiff fails to make up record and enter suggestion of death, defendant should call upon him to do so, and if he fail, apply for leave to do it; and (suggestion being entered) should move for judgment as in case of nonsuit, C.P. 120

— Peremptory undertaking to try not an engagement to try at all events, and a bond fide attempt to fulfil undertaking a compliance therewith. Plaintiff entered cause for trial according to peremptory undertaking, but it was not reached in course of business and made a remanet.—Defendant not entitled to judgment as in case of nonsuit, C.P. 213

Landlord and Tenant—Agreement by A. under mortgage deed, to become tenant to B. of premises demised, "henceforth at will and pleasure of B. at yearly rent of 25*l.* 4*s.* payable quarterly," creates tenancy at will; and occupation for two years, and payment of rent under agreement, do not make B. tenant from year to year, Q.B. 3

— Defendant held under lease from A. for fourteen years and a half from Christmas 1831, and paid rent to A. until it expired on June 24, 1846; he continued in possession, and paid rent to lessor of plaintiff, who had become entitled to premises.—Notice to quit expiring on June 24, held good, Q.B. 108

— Sheriff who seizes goods in execution, and assigns to execution creditor, having notice that year's rent is due to landlord, may be liable to an action at suit of landlord, but landlord cannot distrain for his year's rent while goods are in possession of sheriff or his assignee. Trespass qu. cl. fr. of plaintiff: plea, entry to seize growing crops under distress for rent: replication, previous seizure under f. fa., at suit of

- plaintiff against tenant of locus in quo, and assignment to plaintiff by sheriff: rejoinder, that seizure made after notice to sheriff and plaintiff that year's rent was due to landlord, &c.—Rejoinder bad; and replication not a departure from declaration, for although replication shewed a tenant from whom rent due at time of execution, yet that possession was consistent with possession of plaintiff at time of trespass, Q.B. 278
- Landlord and Tenant (continued)—Custom of country applicable to all tenancies, whether verbal or in writing, unless expressly or impliedly excluded by written terms, Q.B. 319
- Declaration that, in consideration that B. had become tenant to A, upon terms that B. should, during his said tenancy, keep premises in repair, B. promised A. to keep premises in repair during his said tenancy upon terms aforesaid; that tenancy of B. continued until commencement of action, but B. did not, during his said tenancy, keep premises in repair. Plea, that after B. had become tenant to A, and before committing breach, A. assigned to C. all his interest in demised premises and in reversion expectant on determination of B.'s said tenancy; and A. thenceforth ceased to have anything in demised premises, and B. thence ceased to be tenant thereof to A. Plea no answer, contract to repair being contract to repair during tenancy, which was not put an end to by assignment, C.P. 192
- Where payment of rent unexplained would ordinarily imply yearly tenancy, payer or receiver of rent may give in evidence circumstances under which payment made, for purpose of repelling such implication, C.P. 263
- Notice to quit. See Ejectment. And see County Court.
- Land Tax Redemption—Representatives of tenant for life who has redeemed land tax under 42 Geo. 3. c. 116. may be compelled by reversioner to accept consideration paid for redemption, together with arrears of interest, so as to render land no longer chargeable with interest. And, where defendants in replevin avowed as devisees of tenant for life in respect of yearly sum payable as interest on redemption money, and plaintiff pleaded in bar that he held a moiety of remainder in fee as tenant in common, and had, before the distress, tendered to defendants redemption money and interest,—Held, that the plea was good, Q.B. 273
- See Copyhold.
- Lease—B, tenant for life, with power of leasing, made in April 1788 a lease to A. for ninety-nine years, determinable on three lives, of a portion of premises already demised to A. by two several leases of 1760 and 1784: lease of 1788 purported to be granted "for and in consideration of the surrendering up to B." of the leases of 1760 and 1784; "and in order to effectuate an agreement entered into between A. and one C. for sale to C. of residue of premises, which residue lease recited was intended to be demised by B. to C., by indenture of lease bearing even date therewith:" lease to A, of April 1788, was not a good execution of the power, but lease of 1784 was: lease of 1760 had determined: residue of premises, mentioned in lease to A. of April 1788, was demised to C, by indenture of that date, by a valid subsisting lease.—Held, that acceptance by A. of lease of April 1718, did not as to premises thereby demised to A, operate as an absolute surrender in law of lease of 1784; and on ejectment being brought by remainder-man after death of tenant for life, that lease of 1784 must be considered as subsisting, Q.B. 143
- In 1755, tenant for life, under a power of leasing demised lands to defendant for ninety-nine years, determinable on lives; and in 1812, under same power, a further lease in reversion of same lands for ninety-nine years on additional lives; that lease was not a valid execution of the power; but purported to be made "in consideration of the surrendering up into the hands of the lessor by the lessee" of lease of 1755, "which surrender is hereby made and accepted accordingly."—This did not operate as a surrender of lease of 1755, and one of lives named in that lease being still in esse, ejectment would not lie, Q.B. 151
- Proof of a conversation fourteen or fifteen years back with owner of property in dispute, under whom lessor of plaintiff claimed, in which owner of certain premises admitted they had been released, without stating term, or lives, or rent, or any other particulars, cannot be made available as proof of new lease having been granted, C.P. 263

- Licence. See Appeal. Assignment.
- Lien—An innkeeper received carriage and harness of a person not residing at his inn, but who took refreshments there occasionally, and whose friend resided there for some time at his credit and by his direction.—Innkeeper had no lien upon carriage, &c. for his bill, which included charges for keep of horses, standing of carriage, and refreshments for owner and his friend, C.P. 219
- See Deed.
- Limitations, Statute of—To plea, under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 5, that cause of action on a deed did not accrue within twenty years, replication, alleging written acknowledgment of debt within twenty years, need not set out writing, Q.B. 298
- In action for money lent defendant pleaded Statute of Limitations; and at trial plaintiff proved transmission of money to defendant, and payment of a half-yearly sum for interest up to a certain time, and produced an answer to a bill in Chancery, in which defendant admitted having paid the half-yearly sum within six years, but asserted that it was paid by way of annuity, and not as interest. Assuming that acknowledgment of payment must be in writing, and signed under 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. s. 1, in order to bar the statute, the above evidence for plaintiff was sufficient to go to jury. Construction of admission in answer for the Court, and the whole should be left to jury; but they might believe fact of payments having been made half-yearly, but reject residue, and infer from other evidence that payments were really made in respect of interest. Words used at time of making a payment qualify it; but it is for the jury to judge of truth of statement accompanying admission of previous payment, Ex. 35;

Malicious Arrest. See Pleading.

Malicious Prosecution—Reasonable and probable cause is to be determined on facts, existence of which, in cases of doubt, can only be properly decided by jury; but it is not necessary for Judge, when there are a variety of facts, to leave each fact specifically to jury, but he should decide, on a general view of circumstances, whether there is or not reasonable and probable cause for prosecution. Where one of several defendants, in an indictment for conspiracy, pays costs of himself and others of defending indictment, he may recover such costs as damages in action for malicious prosecution, Q.B. 65

— In case for malicious prosecution for perjury, Judge left it to jury to say whether defendant believed, or had reasonable and probable cause for believing, that plaintiff was guilty of perjury, and whether he acted maliciously; and jury having found he did not believe that plaintiff was guilty of perjury, but had acted from improper motives, with view to exclude his evidence,—On motion for new trial, Judge right in holding there was evidence of malice. The "prohibited degrees of consanguinity and affinity" in 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 54. refer to decisions of ecclesiastical courts at that time. Master and Servant—No other instrument is necessary under 4 Geo. 4. c. 34. s. 3. than a warrant of commitment, founded on a sufficient information; legality of imprisonment must depend on legality and sufficiency of that instrument alone. Semble—Such an instrument is an order, not a conviction. Whether such an instrument is to be construed less strictly, as an order, or more strictly, as a conviction, it is bad if it does not shew on face of it, either that contract between master and servant was in writing, or that servant had entered into service, Q.B. 111

— Declaration on contract by defendant to employ plaintiff in his service until service determined by due and reasonable notice; breach, that defendant wrongfully dismissed him without notice; with count for work and labour. First plea, to special count, that plaintiff misconducted himself by refusing to work, and that defendant discharged him; second plea, also to that count, that defendant, in consequence of plaintiff's misconduct in absenting himself, summoned him before a magistrate under 4 Geo. 4. c. 34, and that magistrate discharged him. The proof was, that plaintiff was hired generally as an agricultural labourer, and left work before eight o'clock on a particular day because beer was not supplied, and that he was on following day taken before magistrate, who ordered his discharge from service.—Hiring being general, defendant was entitled to verdict on first count on ground of variance. Also, on both special pleas, though jury negatived wrongful absence. And facts stated in those pleas being proved, plaintiff not entitled to recover on count for work and labour, Q.B. 132

P. should not absent himself from such service without licence of such persons so carrying on business, nor serve other persons during term; that plaintiff should, during time T. P. continued employed, pay him 24s. per week for 1,200 tables, and other rates for extra tables, and when tables were not wanted should find him other work, so that he should not earn less than 24s. per week, except when a furnace was out, when he should have 21s. per week; and in case T. P. should become incapacitated to perform, or fail to perform such work, or if plaintiff or his partner, &c. should discontinue business during seven years, then they should be able to employ other persons, and not be bound to pay anything to T. Mine—Custom for miner or boulder to enter and work land, in search of minerals (such working not having been commenced or prosecuted by owner or

- other person), rendering a portion of produce to lord or owner of soil, and giving due notice of his proceedings, not an illegal or unreasonable custom; and interest so acquired by virtue of custom is, if bounder continues in possession and works the mine, such an interest in mine as may be recovered in ejectment; but such customary right cannot exist unless there be a bond fide continuing by bounder to search for ore. Where plaintiff declared on his possession of a certain "tenement," to wit, "the right to dig and get ore, found and being within certain tin bounds," and charged defendant with disturbing him, and carrying away ore, &c. held, that although statement of plaintiff's right might properly describe that which existed when he first took possession of bounds under custom; yet in order to make out his right as claimed he must shew a bond fide continuing to work mine, and that annual renewal by new cutting turves, however useful for ascertaining limits, could not be considered as equivalent to such working. Such a claim is to be tried as a custom limited in local extent, and not as a local law of a particular district, Q.B. 34

Defendant not relieved from liability by stat. 6 Ann. c. 31. and 14 Geo. 3. c. 78, which apply to fires the result of chance, or incapable of being traced to any cause, but not to fires which, though accidental, as contradistinguished from wilful, are occasioned by want of reasonable care, Q.B. 89 was vested in known existing trustees:—First, nature of trust not special, so as to prevent operation of 59 Geo. 3. c. 12. s. 17; secondly, that words of 17th section of that act imperative, and not merely enabling, in cases to which it is applicable. But lastly, in cases in which there are known living trustees, section 17. does not contain words sufficiently strong to divest legal estate from such trustees, and that property so circumstanced cannot be considered as “belonging to the parish” within meaning of statute, (overruling *Rumball v. — Notice of objection sent by post, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 100, should have an address on outside as well as inside. Where notice sent by post had directions both on outside and inside, and paper produced as a duplicate to prove service, contained direction inside but none outside, paper not a duplicate, and service not proved, C.P. 32

— Notice of objection to voter for a borough:—“To Mr. C. S. 1, Olney Place. Take notice, I object to your name being retained on list of voters for borough of Cheltenham. (Signed) J. F. of No. 5, Sherborne Street, on list of voters for parish of Cheltenham.” Description of objector’s place of abode, No. 5, Sherborne Street, means Sherborne Street, Cheltenham, and a compliance with requirements of 17th section of Registration Act. Whether notice of objection designates on face of it objector’s place of abode, a question of law. Whether such designation is sufficiently particular, a question of fact, C.P. 34

— In appeal under Registration Act, paper books should be delivered four days before hearing, and Court will only allow them to be delivered nunc pro tunc upon reasonable excuse, C.P. 65

— Voter’s qualification in county register was described in third and fourth columns respectively, as “Land above 50L.” “Own occupation.” Within twelve months next before 31st of July, he changed his occupation, and took adjoining land, sufficiently designated by description in old register, and did not send in any new claim:—Voter erased from register. When right to vote depends upon occupation of premises in immediate succession, whole of subject-matter composing qualification must be fully described in register. County voter who claims under section 73. of 6 Vict. c. 18, must always send in a new claim to vote, C.P. 66

— A shed described by revising barrister as follows:—“The shed stands against a wooden paling, but not fastened thereto; six posts put into ground, support a tarpauling which forms roof; one of the sides is boarded up with boards nailed to posts; shed is used to put barrows, posts, &c. into, and wharfage is paid for use of it.”—is a “warehouse” or “other building” within 27th section of Reform Act. Decision of revising barrister will be affirmed, unless it appears from facts stated in case that it was wrong, C.P. 68

— Qualification of borough vote described in overseers’ list in third column as “Houses in succession,” in fourth column as “Butcher Row.” Voter had occupied two houses during twelve months next previous to 31st of July, one in Coleham, the other in Butcher Row.—Barrister no power under 40th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. to amend description of qualification by altering “house” in third column to houses, and by adding “Coleham” in fourth column; he cannot amend so as to add to subject-matter of qualification, C.P. 70

— In consolidated appeal, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 44, the case after stating facts applicable to each voter, and reasons upon which barrister’s decisions were founded, concluded, “If Court should be of opinion that occupation and residence of each or any of appellants was sufficient, names of all or such as Court shall think fit, are to be retained on register, otherwise to be expunged.”—Appeals improperly consolidated, as decision on one would not govern the rest; and Court had no jurisdiction to entertain any of the appeals, and case struck out, C.P. 73

— When appeal from decision of barrister is called on, and respondent does not appear, appellant must prove service of ten days’ notice on respondent, or shew sufficient excuse for omission; otherwise appeal will be struck out, C.P. 142

— Notice of objection on borough voter served by putting notice, and leaving it, within entrance door of voter’s place of abode between nine and ten o’clock of night of 25th of August,—insufficient. Whether notice of objection has been properly served is a question of fact to be determined by barrister, C.P. 143

— By letters patent, management of a lunatic’s property was granted to a committee, who was to render a yearly account thereof to Court of Chancery: committee occupied land of lunatic worth 393l. per annum, and described himself as tenant, and debited himself with that sum as rent, in yearly account rendered to and allowed by Court of Chancery.—He did not occupy as tenant lands or tenements, within meaning of 20th section of Reform Act, C.P. 253

— Privilege of.—Members of House of Commons privileged from arrest on ca. sa. for forty days before and forty days after meeting of Parliament. Rule the same in case of a dissolution as in prorogation, Ex. 76

Parties. See Assumpsit. Contract.

Partners.—As to implied authority to borrow money, C.P. 17

— Right of partner to maintain trespass against another partner, after notice of dissolution, for entering on partnership premises, C.P. 50

— Partnership not created between trustees and a party who carried on business under a deed for benefit of creditors under controul and direction of trustees, Ex. 346

— See Assumpsit. Contract.

Patent.—By indenture, reciting that by deed of 1842 plaintiff had granted to defendant licence to make and vend a patent, subject to payment of royalty, with proviso for keeping royalty at an average of 16l. 13s. 4d. per month, and also reciting that defendant had agreed with plaintiff to purchase one half of patent, plaintiff, in consideration of 2,200l. for purchase of one-half patent and one half royalty, assigned to trustee for defendant patent and matters intended to be assigned: plaintiff covenanted in usual form for title, and defendant covenanted to pay 2,200l. by instalments: in an action for non-payment of two instalments, defendant, setting out deed of 1842 and letters patent, pleaded a denial of validity of patent.—Held, no answer: first, because defendant, under deed of 1842, would be at all events bound to pay 16*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* royalty per month; and, secondly, because defendant's covenant was independent of covenant for title by plaintiff, Q.B. 217

Patent (continued)—In action for infringing plaintiff's specification alleged that invention consisted in submitting hosiery to finishing process of a press heated by steam, hot water, or other fluid. The invention consisted of two cast-iron boxes filled with steam, between heated surfaces of which hosiery goods were introduced and subjected to pressure produced by hydraulic power. The pressure generally lasted three minutes, and might be produced either by screw or by hydraulic power. The specification stated that patentee did not claim finishing of woollen cloths by heat generally, but submitting of hosiery, &c. to pressure of hot boxes or surfaces heated by steam, water, or other fluid. The defendant's machine consisted of rollers heated by steam, between which woollen fabrics similar to those of plaintiff were introduced and subjected to pressure. The jury found that defendant's rollers were not a colourable imitation of plaintiff's patent:—Held, not an infringement, Ex. 122

Pauper Lunatic. See Poor Law.

Paving Act—The Metropolitan Paving Act, 57 Geo. 3. c. 29, gives power to apprehend all persons who, not being employed by or contracting with Commissioners under act, shall carry away any "dust, cinders, or ashes," within district:—Held, that ashes falling from furnace of brass-founder, containing particles of metal, which were by him subjected to a process whereby a portion of metal was extracted, and residue given by him to his apprentices as a perquisite, and by them sold to a brass refiner, for purpose of extracting further quantity of metal, were not "dust, cinders, or ashes" within act. By section 136. no action shall be brought against any person for anything done in pursuance of act until after twenty-one days' notice in writing; and "if it shall appear that such action was brought before twenty-one days' notice was given," jury shall find a verdict for defendant.—Want of notice of action must be specially pleaded, Ex. 117

Payment—Averment of payment of rent in arrear (see Trespass), C.P. 150

Penally—Distribution of. See Conviction. And see Copyright. Covenant. Distress.

Perjury—Trial before Secondary of London, properly described in indictment for perjury as before sheriff, to whom writ is directed. Two issues being joined on record, indictment properly alleged that they came on to be tried, though only one tried. Perjury may be assigned as to what a man has sworn he thought or believed; difficulty, if any, being in proof. Where witness swore he did not write certain words in presence of D, assignment of perjury that he did write them in presence of D, is good, Q.B. 72

—Indictment for perjury contained four counts, stating that defendant had retained U, an attorney, who had delivered his bill under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, and that after expiration of one month from such delivery, U. had taken out summons before a Judge to get bill taxed; that defendant, before shewing cause, made affidavit denying he had retained U, and perjury was assigned on this statement, indictment alleging that "it became and was material in shewing cause against the summons to ascertain whether the defendant did retain U:" each count concluded, "and so the jurors, &c. did say that the said defendant, &c. did commit wilful perjury," &c.—Held, that "month" was to be construed with reference to 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, and meant calendar month; that jurisdiction of Judge to issue a summons on application of attorney, was sufficiently shewn without negating a prior application within month by party chargeable; that fact of retainer was material; and that conclusion of counts might be rejected as surplusage. The record stated venire to be to try whether defendant was guilty of perjury and misdeemeanor aforesaid, and entry of verdict that "he is guilty of perjury and misdeemeanor aforesaid, in manner and form," &c., and a general judgment of imprisonment was given "on the premises."—Held, that "misdeemeanor" being nomen collectivum, venire and verdict applied to all the counts, and judgment of imprisonment was divisible, Q.B. 168

Piracy. See Copyright.

—Trespass for assault and imprisonment; plea to assault, that defendant was possessed of dwelling-house; that plaintiff making noise and disturbance there; and defendant molitor manus imposuit to turn him out. Replication, that house a common ale-house, and that plaintiff lawfully drinking there, wherefore he refused to depart; and defendant of his own wrong committed trespasses:—Replication, insufficient, as it must be taken to admit that plaintiff was making noise and disturbance, and was in that case no answer to the plea. Plea, to assault and imprisonment, that defendant was possessed of a tavern or alehouse, and plaintiff conducted himself in a rude and quarrelsome manner in it, assaulted defendant and others, and afterwards and before, &c., remained standing in street near door of house, using loud, menacing and disgusting language to defendant and his family, who were within hearing, and by reason thereof many persons congregated about the house and made a riot and disturbance; and at time when, &c. plaintiff was causing persons to congregate in breach of the peace, whereupon defendant, after requesting him to go, gave him in charge to police officer:—Held good, as sufficiently shewing matter amounting to a breach of the peace by plaintiff, Q.B. 73

—Declaration against maker of promissory note, indorsed by W. to plaintiff; plea set-off due to defendant from W. before indorsement to plaintiff, and W. to deprive defendant of his set-off, fraudulently indorsed to plaintiff, to enable him to sue on note as agent of W, and no consideration for indorsement to plaintiff, and that plaintiff sued as agent of W. according to said fraud.—De injuriis good, as substance of plea was, that indorsement to plaintiff was fraudulent, Q.B. 97

—In indebitatus assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, defendant cannot, under non assumpsit, shew that plaintiff had no legal title to goods at time of sale, Q.B. 103

—An assault ex vi termini excludes consent; and plea of leave and licence to declaration charging an assault amounts to general issue. Quere—If it can be pleaded to an action for imprisonment, Q.B. 109

—To declaration in assumpsit containing a set of counts for work done, and money paid by, and on an account stated with D, alleging promises made to D, and a similar set of counts by and with plaintiffs as executors of D, laying promises to the plaintiffs as such executors, a plea of indemnity by D. was held good, to avoid circuitry of action. A plea, that D. in his lifetime caused and procured defendant to enter into promises in declaration by fraud and covin, was held to be well pleaded to whole declaration, as defendant had a right to treat work done, money paid by, and account stated with plaintiff as being done, paid, and stated in continuance and in respect of previous contract with D, and that fraud used in procuring that contract extended to implied promise arising from plaintiffs' performance of it, Q.B. 125

— Declaration on bill of exchange; plea, that defendant not being a trader, &c., at passing of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, duly presented his petition for protection to Court of Bankruptcy in London, which had annexed to it a full schedule of debts containing all matters mentioned in statute; that petition was filed, &c. that final order for protection and distribution was made by commissioner for protecting defendant from all process, and for vesting his estate in T. M. A., one of official assignees; that debts in declaration mentioned accrued before filing of petition, and that order was still in force, &c.:—Held, a good plea in form and substance, as shewing effect of a final order under 10th section of above statute, though it did not shew appointment of a creditors' assignee, Q.B. 129

— Upon a plea alleging an enjoyment of an easement as of right for thirty years, under 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71, if plaintiff under section 7. relies on existence of a life estate, that is a matter which not being inconsistent with simple fact of enjoyment, must under section 5. be pleaded specially, Q.B. 138

— Averment that bill of exchange given "for and on account of and in payment and discharge" of a debt, not equivalent to averment that bill was given in satisfaction, Q.B. 295

— To declaration for work and labour, plea that work, &c. consisted of appraisement of personal property which plaintiff appraised in expectation of reward to be therefore paid by defendant to him, without being duly licensed according to 46 Geo. 3. c. 43,—is good without stating that plaintiff did work as an appraiser, as it followed words of statute; and without negating that appraisement was for purpose of ascertaining legacy duty. Same rule applies to declarations and subsequent pleadings, as to negating exceptions in acts of parliament, Q.B. 299

— First count, that it was agreed between defendant and plaintiffs, that defendant should sell and deliver to plaintiffs certain iron rails to be made and delivered of certain weights and shapes at price stated, and said rails to be inspected and certified as then agreed on, and to be of certain quality; and that defendant did make and deliver certain rails as and for rails of such quality, alleging as breach that rails were not of said quality; plea that rails were, according to agreement, to be inspected by an agent of plaintiffs, who was at liberty to approve and accept same if he should think fit, and that rails were inspected and approved and accepted by such agent on delivery of same. Plea bad, in substance, as not answering breach complained of, and only shewing performance of one of stipulations of contract.—Semble, also bad in form, as amounting to general issue. Second count stated that defendant promised to deliver rails fit and proper for purpose of certain railway; alleging as breach that rails delivered were not fit and proper for railway; plea similar to plea to first count.—Plea bad in substance, for same reason, and, also, in form, as amounting to general issue, Q.B. 309

— In action for indorsing writ of ca. sa. and imprisoning the plaintiff thereon for a larger sum than was due on judgment, and for indorsing fi. fa. and seizing plaintiff's goods for greater sum than was due on second judgment,—Declaration insufficient, if it does not contain averments of malice and of want of reasonable and probable cause, Q.B. 321

— The rule of Hilary term, 4 Will. 4. tit. 'Trespass,' r. 6. applies to actions on the case as well as trespass, and to declarations as well as pleas. In case for disturbance of ferry, plaintiff alleged he was possessed of an ancient ferry for passengers and goods to and from A, from and to B, and defendant pleaded not possessed, and traverse of ancient and entire right of ferry; and jury found that there was a ferry from A. to B. only,—Verdict might be entered distributively for plaintiff for so much as proved at trial, Q.B. 323

— Covenant running with the land. Defeasance. Duplicity in plea. Plea bad for not shewing payment and release of a mortgage debt. On demurrer, dates of assignments under videlicet taken to be true, Q.B. 342

— Action for use and occupation; plea, first, that plaintiff seized goods of defendant sufficient to pay rent and costs, and detained them for two years, when it was agreed between them that plaintiff should retain goods in satisfaction of debt; that he did so accordingly. Secondly, that after wrongful seizure by plaintiff of goods of sufficient value, &c., plaintiff and defendant agreed that plaintiff should retain goods, and that they should relinquish their claims on each other. Thirdly, that they agreed that plaintiff should retain goods so seized, and that they should relinquish their claims, and defendant give up possession. Replications, traversing seizure of goods of sufficient value, &c. On demurrer, pleas good, and replications bad for putting in issue matter which was only inducement to acceptance in satisfaction, which was material part of pleas, C.P. 92

— Scienter is in issue under not guilty, in case for negligently keeping a ferocious dog (see Action), C.P. 124

— Trover for hops; plea, that before plaintiff was possessed, M. & Co. were possessed as of their own property; that M. & Co. lost the same, which came by finding into possession of S. B., who immediately lost possession of same, which came by finding into possession of T. E., who immediately and just before said time when, &c. sold and delivered same to plaintiff, whereupon defendants, as servants and by command of M. & Co. took the hops, &c., which is the same conversion, &c. Replication de injuriis.—On this issue plaintiff could give in evidence a valid sale of the hops by M. & Co. to S. B., through whom plaintiff derived his title. On motion for new trial on misdirection of Judge in telling jury that if there was a valid sale to S. B. plaintiff was entitled to recover,—held, that plea must be taken after verdict to import a continuing title in M. & Co. down to time of conversion, which fact being material was put in issue by de injuriis, and so the evidence was admissible and the direction right: or, that plea was immaterial for not containing such allegation; and in either case that defendants were not entitled to a new trial, C.P. 132

— In action for infringement of copyright, a count on 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. will not be allowed with a count for infringement of same copyright at common law. A count on that statute set forth the requisitions of the statute, and concluded contra formam statuti.—Plaintiff on such count may set up his common law right, if he fail to bring his case within the statute, C.P. 137

ment, ordered to be struck out. First count on an agreement by defendant to take plaintiff into his service for six months, and at expiration thereof, if no just cause shewn, to enter into fresh agreement for two years; first breach, that though no just cause shewn at expiration of the six months, defendant would not enter into further agreement for two years: second count, that whereas plaintiff had been six months in defendant's service, defendant agreed to continue him for two years; breach, that defendant would not continue him.—So much of first count as related to first breach, struck out as being in violation of rule Hil. term, 4 Will. 4. r. 5, C.P. 159

Pleading (continued).—First count in covenant stated that by deed between plaintiff and defendant, described as a "company registered and incorporated after a deed of settlement had been executed under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110," defendants agreed to pay plaintiff 15,000*l.* as soon as conveniently could be out of money raised by first calls or instalments on shares of company; breach, that although divers instalments were paid, out of which company might have paid the money, they had not done so; second count set out articles of agreement stating that plaintiff had sold his patents to company, and containing covenant that company should pay him 15,000*l.* in cash as soon as conveniently could be done out of money raised on first instalments or calls on shares; breach, that though company could have raised the money, and a reasonable and convenient time for paying it had elapsed, yet they had not paid plaintiff: 3rd plea to 1st count, that the deed of settlement was obtained by fraud of plaintiff: 4th plea to 1st count, that registry and incorporation were obtained by fraud: 8th plea, that company was formed under deed of settlement to which plaintiff was a party, by which it was agreed that plaintiff was to be paid out of first instalments after paying necessary expenses of company, and that no instalments, &c. had been received sufficient to pay expenses and the 15,000*l.*: 21st plea, that company was not incorporated by charter or act of parliament, nor was the same "duly and lawfully" registered and incorporated: 22nd plea, that when company obtained a certificate of complete registration, it was not formed by deed or writing under hands and seals of the shareholders as required by the statute.—Held, that the 2nd count was good on general demurrer, and breach properly assigned; that the 3rd, 4th, 8th, and 18th pleas were bad on demurrer; that the 21st plea was bad, because defendants were estopped from denying fact of incorporation, and if that fact was not in issue, because plea raised a question of law; that the 22nd plea was bad for similar reasons, C.P. 166

—Action against surety upon bond under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 8, for payment of a debt by H., or his rendering himself in any action to be brought: Plea, that plaintiff had brought action in Queen's Bench, and issued ca. sa. on judgment, on which H. was taken and detained in custody, according to practice of said court, and that from recovery of judgment until arrest, H. was ready and willing to surrender himself according to practice of court and condition of bond, and that by reason of his having been so taken and detained, "he was, by practice of said court, exonerated and discharged from rendering himself according to said condition."—On special demurrer, defendant was allowed to amend; and semble—that plea should either have shewn practice of court, and that H. did surrender, if facts alleged amounted to a surrender by such practice, or that it became impossible for H. to sur-

—Declaration that by articles of agreement plaintiff agreed to sell, and defendant to purchase, a piece of land, and plaintiff agreed to deliver an abstract of title and to deduce a clear title within a month from signing contract, or from being required so to do; that defendant agreed to pay portion of purchase-money on signing contract, and residue on or before a future fixed day, and to pay interest in mean time half-yearly; that plaintiff did, within one month from being required, deliver abstract of and deduce a clear title: breach, non-payment of half a year's interest: plea, that plaintiff did not deliver abstract of and deduce a clear title modo et forma.—On demurrer, plea held bad for raising an immaterial issue; delivery of abstract and deduction of title not being a condition precedent to payment of money. Quare—Whether the plea was not bad for duplicity, in denying both the delivery of abstract and the deduction of title, C.P. 234

—In action for money had and received non assumptis puts in issue the receipt and the existence of facts which make it a receipt to plaintiff's use. Defendant pleaded, that money claimed was paid to him and others, as members of a committee of management in a railway scheme, by way of deposits on shares allotted by them to plaintiff, at his request, and that plaintiff and other shareholders agreed to form a partnership for carrying on the undertaking: that plaintiff sought to recover his deposits, on ground that scheme had not been prosecuted for an unreasonable time: that after 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28, a meeting was duly held, at which it was resolved that the partnership should be dissolved, and undertaking abandoned: that affairs then became liable to be wound up as on dissolution of a partnership, by mutual consent: that plaintiff's claim was part of affairs to be wound up, and that they had not been wound up, nor had a reasonable time for winding them up elapsed at commencement of suit.—On special demurrer held bad, as amounting to general issue, C.P. 266

—Declaration in debt on bond given by defendants and L. for 8,000*l.* to be paid by them to plaintiffs, or Everett, on request, non-payment, &c.: Plea craved oyer and set out bond and condition and recitals; Condition that defendants and L. should pay over sums of money assessed and collected by L. and that L. should demand sums assessed and proceed against defaulters: averment that defendants performed all things on their part to be performed: replication, praying deed and condition to be inrolled, and being set out on inrolment, demurrer, on ground that they were falsely set out by defendants on account of recitals being introduced, and that plea of general performance bad:—First, not necessary to state request in declaration. Secondly, allegation "by reason of the non-payment," a sufficient denial of payment to plaintiffs or Everett, after plea. Thirdly, plea bad for not shewing performance by L. Fourthly, plea bad for averring general performance, instead of showing what done in performance of condition. Semble—Practice is not to demur for mis-recital on oyer; and effect of inrolment is to make matter set out part of declaration, C.P. 295

—To debt for goods sold and delivered, plea, in substance that goods were quantities of coals sold and delivered by him to plaintiffs, respectively exceeding 560*lb.* and respectively delivered within city of London, in divers, to wit, two carts, without delivering, before any such quantities of coal were unloaded, ticket signed by plaintiffs according to form of statute an answer to the action,—the Coal Act, 1 & 2 Vict. c. ci. s. 3, being passed for the protection of purchasers. That statute applies if quantity at one delivery exceeds 560lb. though delivered in carts each containing less than 560lb. If vendor prevented, by purchaser, from delivering ticket, that is matter to be replied. Vendor's name must be written in ticket as a signature, though sufficient if written by agent. Negation, in above plea, of delivery of a ticket sufficiently applied to each delivery, C.P. 311

— Frivolous demurrer, Ex. 8

— Duplicity and uncertainty, Ex. 13

— To declaration containing three counts, defendant, appearing by attorney, obtained rule generally to plead coverture and Statute of Limitations, and pleaded those pleas to whole declaration. Pleas were set aside by Judge at chambers, on ground that defendant could not appear by attorney and plead coverture. Defendant, without obtaining fresh rule to plead, pleaded to first two counts, coverture, and to whole declaration, Statute of Limitations, and plaintiff signed judgment.—Judgment irregular, as rule to plead had not been set aside, and defendant was at liberty to plead pleas, and was not bound by terms of rule to plead them to whole declaration, Ex. 25

— Declaration that plaintiff agreed with defendants to act as their salesman for a year, and not to be connected with any other house in disposing of their goods, and defendants agreed to pay plaintiff 200l. for such servitude. Averment, that plaintiff entered into defendant's service, and was not connected with any other house, and had always until expiration of one year from agreement been ready and willing, and offered to remain in such employ. Breach, that defendants would not suffer plaintiff to act as their salesman during remainder of year, but discharged him from performance of his agreement, and had not paid him 200l. Plea, as to non-payment of 200l., that after plaintiff ceased to be in defendant's employ, and during said year, he entered into service of another house, and became connected with that house in disposing of their goods:—On special demurrer, plea bad, as amounting to an argumentative denial of plaintiff's readiness and willingness to continue in defendant's employment, Ex. 98

— Declaration that plaintiff being indebted to H. L. in 36l., H. L. sued out a writ of summons for recovery thereof; that afterwards plaintiff obtained a protection from process, whereof defendant had notice: yet defendant, well knowing that plaintiff was protected from process, but wilfully and maliciously intending to injure him, procured a judgment to be signed against him in the said action, and wilfully and maliciously intending, &c., sued out a testatum ca. sa., under which sheriff arrested plaintiff:—Declaration bad, in omitting to state defendant arrested plaintiff without reasonable and probable cause, Ex. 99

— Declaration, that in consideration that plaintiff had become tenant to defendant of a farm, upon terms that if plaintiff should receive from defendant notice to quit, and should have made extensive improvements, for which subsequent crops should not have compensated plaintiff, farm should be looked over by two men, one to be appointed by each party, who should determine compensation, defendant promised that if tenancy should be determined, and plaintiff should have made improvements for which he should not have been compensated, defendant would, at plaintiff's request, appoint a person for such purpose. Averment, that tenancy was determined by defendant; that plaintiff had made improvements for which he had not been compensated; that although plaintiff, after determination of tenancy, appointed J. D. to determine compensation, and J. D. was ready to act, of which defendant had notice, and was then requested by plaintiff to appoint some person on his behalf, yet defendant did not nor would appoint some person in that behalf:—Bad, on special demurrer, in omitting to state that plaintiff had requested defendant to appoint a valuer before commencement of suit, Ex. 100

— Declaration stated that company was a joint-stock company completely registered; that S. P. and C. L., then being two directors of company, made their promissory note, and thereby promised on behalf of said company to pay plaintiff or his order 32l. 4s. 9d., balance of his account due from company, three months after date, which note was signed by S. P. and C. L., and made by them in their names and on behalf of said company, and was expressed by them to be made on behalf of said company, and countersigned by secretary of company; that thereupon defendants, in consideration of premises, then promised plaintiff to pay him amount of promissory note:—Held, bad, on general demurrer, Ex. 118

— A proceeding by audita querela is an "action or suit" within 4 & 5 Ann. c. 16. s. 4, and a defendant may plead several pleas thereto, Ex. 121

— A special count in assumpsit stated in substance, that in consideration of plaintiff having, at defendant's request, contracted to sell to a third party on his own credit certain shares in a railway company, of which defendant was registered holder, defendant promised to deliver to him all new shares allotted in respect of such shares while he continued registered holder thereof, on payment to him of all payments made by him to the company in respect of such new shares, and to indemnify plaintiff from all loss which might arise by reason of non-performance of his said promise; alleging non-delivery of certain new shares so allotted, and that by reason thereof plaintiff had necessarily expended a large sum of money in purchase of other shares, in order to perform his said contract of sale.—Such count may be pleaded with a count for money paid, Ex. 146

— A declaration stated that certain persons drew a bill of exchange on G. & E. W., and indorsed it to defendant, who indorsed it to plaintiffs; defendant pleaded that plaintiffs made and indorsed the bill to him before he indorsed it to them; and that, at time of his so indorsing the bill to plaintiffs, they were liable to pay the amount to him, according to their previous indorsement: plaintiffs replied, stating an agreement between them and defendant and G. & E. W., to forbear and give time to defendant and G. & E. W. for payment of another bill accepted by G. W., and indorsed by E. W., the maker, to defendant and by him to plaintiffs, till time for payment of bill declared on had elapsed, and averring that plaintiffs had forbore accordingly.—Replication bad, as being a departure from declaration, Ex. 149

— Declaration containing a count on a bill of exchange and a count on an account stated: plea, that defendant did not indorse the bill in said first count mentioned modo et forma: defendant being under terms to plead issuably, plaintiff signed judgment on ground that the plea being pleaded to whole declaration, and containing no answer to last count, was not issuable.—Judgment irregular. A plea is not non-issuable which is only bad on special demurrer, Ex. 169

— Although agreement to convey equity of redemption must be in writing, yet a plea to an action

- of debt on an indenture of mortgage, which stated an agreement by plaintiff and other mortgagees to forego balance of their respective mortgages beyond the value of a bankrupt estate upon receiving their share of assets, would be good on demurrer, even though it expressly stated contract to have been by parol, inasmuch as agreement by plaintiff was binding on him and receipt of his share of assets was a satisfaction for the estate; because the agreement of the other mortgagees to take their shares of assets also was a good consideration for giving up the claim for residue of debt against defendants. Quare—Whether such plea, if proved, would be a good bar. Ex. 182
- Pleading* (continued)—A judgment of assets quando acciderint affects all assets then in hands of executor not administered, as well as those which may come into his hands subsequently. In action against executor, defendant pleaded plene administravit prater, and plaintiff replied that assets had come to defendant's hands since plea pleaded. Replication held to be unnecessary and bad, Ex. 198
- Declaration that it was agreed between plaintiffs and defendant, that plaintiffs should sell to defendant 1,000 barrels of flour, to arrive at Liverpool by the Hottinguer, from New York; that should vessel be lost before arriving at Liverpool the sale should be void: Averment, that vessel was not lost, but arrived at Liverpool from New York, having on board 1,000 barrels of flour: Breach, that defendant did not accept the flour.—This contract general and not confined to any particular voyage, and plea which stated that agreement was made with reference to a voyage at a particular period upon which vessel never sailed, wherefore defendant refused to accept flour, stated a different contract, and was therefore bad as amounting to non assumpsit, Ex. 281
- Declaration in trespass to goods charged defendant with taking and carrying them away, and converting them to his own use.—Such conversion merely matter of aggravation; and plea to whole declaration justifying taking, &c., but omitting to justify conversion, is a good plea, Ex. 299
- Declaration that plaintiff had divers dealings with defendants, and that divers accounts remained unsettled between them; that plaintiff had, for accommodation of one of defendants, accepted divers bills of exchange, and thereupon, in consideration that plaintiff then delivered to defendants three acceptances as follows, &c., as full settlement of debts, defendants promised plaintiff to return him acceptances drawn by defendant as follows, &c.: Breach, that defendants did not return acceptances.—On special demurrer, declaration bad for want of certainty, Ex. 303
- To plea of privilege by attorney alleging that defendant was an attorney of Court of Queen's Bench and not of Court of Exchequer, replication that defendant was an attorney of Court of Exchequer should conclude with verification by record, Ex. 313

- Poor Law*—Appeal—Prior Order of Removal—Quashing for Deficiency of Examination—Estoppel—Decision on the Merits—Evidence, Q.B. 8
- Respondents precluded from giving evidence of either ground of removal, where document relating to one not transmitted, Q.B. 24
- After appeal against order of removal entered and respited, Sessions have power further to respite appeal, though no notice or grounds of appeal have been served upon respondents. Where Sessions refused to further respite appeal, but it appeared that in exercise of their discretion, they would have done so if they had considered they had power,—mandamus commanding the Justices to hear appeal granted, Q.B. 77
- Pariah apprentice was bound by indenture executed by A. B. churchwarden of L. and by C. D. one of overseers of L.:—Indenture sufficient under 54 Geo. 3. c. 107. s. 2. An indenture duly allowed by two Justices under 56 Geo. 3. c. 139. s. 1. reciting that it was made by virtue of an order under hands and seals of A. L. and J. N. C. Justices of the Peace in and for county, &c., made in pursuance of statute in such case made and provided, and bearing date, &c.—good primary evidence of order for binding. Allowance under 56 Geo. 3. c. 139. s. 1. need not appear on face of it to be made within jurisdiction of Justices, Q.B. 89
- By Licensing Act, 9 Geo. 4. c. 61. s. 27, every person who thinks himself aggrieved, may appeal to next General or Quarter Sessions, unless holden within twelve days, and in that case to next subsequent sessions, and not afterwards, and such Sessions are to hear and determine matter of such appeal, and make such order therein, with or without costs, as to Court shall seem meet; judgment to be final and conclusive. Order of Sessions, under this act, purported to be made at General Sessions, holden, &c. on 5th of May, and continued by successive adjournments, until 22nd, and recited that, at General Quarter Sessions in April last, W. B. exhibited his petition of appeal against refusal of certain Justices to grant him a licence, at which said Quarter Sessions appeal, and hearing and determination thereof, was adjourned unto "this present General Sessions," and proceeded to adjudge that, "upon hearing, &c., Court did dismiss appeal, and affirm judgment of Justices, and order and adjudge that said W. B. should pay to Justices 16l. 19s. 2d., for costs, &c." In fact appeal was heard, judgment of Justices affirmed, and licence refused at April sessions:—Held, that act of parliament confined power of adjudicating on appeal to April sessions; and that order made at May sessions without jurisdiction.—Semble, that, at April sessions, appeal had been in point of fact disposed of, and order bad on that ground, Q.B. 108
- An order of removal purporting to be made by B. C. "one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis, sitting at the Clerkenwell Police Court, within the metropolitan police district," sufficiently shews that Clerkenwell Police Court appointed under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 84. Examinations stated that pauper's father resided in H. up to 1826, when he removed to another parish; that pauper resided with his parents in H. as part of their family, and was then under twenty-one; and that in 1816 the father acquired a settlement in H.—Nothing appearing to the contrary, it was to — Order of Justices adjudicating settlement of pauper lunatic and an order for costs of maintenance under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 126. valid though proceedings before Justices taken ex parte, and without notice to parish sought to be affected. Semble—That upon appeal against an order of maintenance made under that statute, settlement of pauper may be put in issue, Q.B. 112

— Under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 10. s. 6. mother of bastard a competent witness to prove she had due notice of appeal under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101. s. 4. Sunday excluded in computing the twenty-four hours within which putative father must give notice of appeal against order of affiliation, under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101. s. 4. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71. s. 2, which empowers Justices of Middlesex to try appeals at General Sessions as at General Quarter Sessions,—only confers an optional jurisdiction, and appellant may proceed, as before, to Quarter Sessions, Q.B. 181

— Examinations on which order of removal made stated that T. G. was employed by overseers of respondent parish to remove paupers to appellat parish, under prior order of 1826; and after he had removed them signed this indorsement on order:—"Delivered to Mr. W, overseer of D, by T. G;" that T. G. was dead, and handwriting was proved: On trial of appeal, it appeared that T. G. was not an overseer, but employed by the overseers who had been seen on morning in question leaving the parish with T. G, and had returned with 4s.: there also appeared to have been a prior order of removal in 1844, which was quashed, "by reason of informality and insufficiency of examinations:" The Sessions held this decision not conclusive.—Examinations contained evidence of the removal under prior order of 1826. Semble—That the indorsement was evidence, as made by a person deceased, in the course of duty. Also, that Sessions having decided on effect of quashing of order of 1844, the Court could not interfere, Q.B. 183

— Notice of chargeability, signed by three overseers as such—prima facie a good notice, though it does not purport to come from a majority of the parish officers. It is matter of evidence whether parish officers sending such notice do or do not constitute majority, Q.B. 209

— Where putative father appears before Justices in pursuance of summons, issued under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, upon application of mother, it must appear upon order that the evidence upon which it was made was given in presence and hearing of putative father, or excuse for omission alleged, Q.B. 219

— Adjudication of settlement of pauper lunatic under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 126. ss. 58, 62, may be comprehended in order for payment of costs of maintenance. Such order may be made on overseers of parish where he is adjudged to be settled, though it form part of a union, Q.B. 224

— Extracts from rate-books produced before removing Justices by vestry clerk of appellat parish need not be sent by respondents with copies of the examinations, it being a document belonging to the appellat parish. It is to be presumed the Justices inspected and decided on the accuracy of the rate-book, Q.B. 271

— It is not an objection to an order of removal that the place at which it is made is not stated in it. Nor that it does not appear on face of order or on the examinations, that pauper did not become chargeable in respect of relief made necessary by sickness or accident. Pauper, after residing thirteen years in H, was, by order unappealed against, on 1st of March 1845, removed to A, where she remained, receiving relief there until 19th of March, when, on being promised 7s. 6d. a week by guardians of A, she returned to H, where her friends lived, and where she had always been desirous of returning: on her return to H. she took possession of a house she had rented before her removal to A. and of which she had kept the key, and in which she had left her furniture whilst she remained at A: guardians of A. discontinuing allowance, she again became chargeable to H. on 4th of November 1846, and another order was made for her removal to A.—Held, that she was properly removable under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, as first removal to A. entirely put an end to the residence at H, Q.B. 277

— Caption of examinations, on which an order of removal is founded, which shews they are taken touching settlement of pauper and on complaint of overseers, is insufficient; it should also shew what the complaint is, Q.B. 288

— Where examinations shew only a birth settlement and grounds of appeal contain only general denial, respondents must give evidence of birth in appellat parish, Q.B. 296

— Under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1. period during which pauper received relief to be excluded only from computation of five years, and does not defeat effect of previous residence, Q.B. 304

— Distinct caption to each examination not necessary, if first caption states name of each witness, Q.B. 312

— Caption of examination upon complaint of overseer, "touching the place of residence, chargeability, and last place of lawful settlement of the pauper" insufficient; notice of chargeability itself must state names of paupers, Q.B. 329

— Parish S. appealed against order, which was quashed by Sessions, and order made that parish C. should pay to parish S. costs of appeal: Sessions had power to make order on C, as that parish was substantially respondent, and payment directed to be made to treasurer of union by prior order was merely on behalf of parish of C. Order shewed on face of it that parish directed to pay costs a party to the appeal, Q.B. 331

— Caption of examinations "upon the complaint of the churchwardens and overseers of the parish of A." insufficient. Removability of wife of marine who had resided in parish A. from February 1841 to October 1846, when she became chargeable, and her husband, who had only occasionally resided with her during above period, had been absent for six months serving at sea, Q.B. 336

— Caption of examination that it was taken "touching the legal settlement" of pauper (not stating any complaint), insufficient, Q.B. 339

— Irremovability of widows whose husbands died before 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. s. 2. Order of removal prior to, but pauper removed subsequent to, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. Irremovability good ground of appeal against order, Q.B. 341

— Order of maintenance on putative father of bastard of married woman, Q.B. 342

— Caption sufficient which states complaint that pauper came to inhabit and actually chargeable, and need not state that pauper had not gained settlement, Q.B. 350

— The 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. s. 1. does not apply to case of residence out of parish at any time during five years preceding order of removal. Quare—If it applies to order unappealed against, or confirmed on appeal, before passing of statute, Q.B. 357

— Residence for five years next before application for order partly as wife and partly as widow, suffi- cient to render her irremovable, under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. That act does not give appeal against order made prior to its passing, on ground of five years' residence, where there has been no actual removal of pauper, Q.B. 359

- Election of Guardians. See Vestry.
- Power*.—A lease was granted in 1831 under a power to make leases for years, determinable on lives, of premises usually so leased, reserving usual rents and heriots, and so as there should be contained usual and reasonable covenants: in the pattern lease, executed in 1749, there was a demise of C, with all waters, watercourses, &c., excepting to the lessor a watercourse flowing from the head weir, through Little Moor Meadow, and from thence by a trough into another meadow, for watering the same and other lands of lessor; and there was a covenant to pay fines, &c., as well as to do suit and service; but from a date prior to 1749, there had been no courts baron or customary courts held for the manor, and no evidence was given of existence of any freehold or copyhold tenants.—Covenant to pay fines, &c. not a usual or reasonable covenant, omission of which avoided the lease. Also, that effect of pattern lease was to pass the channel of the watercourse, reserving only the water itself. Also, that it was a question for the jury, whether quantity of water granted was in excess of that formerly granted, Q.B. 154

- Order for commission to examine witnesses, (see Witness), Q.B. 14, 209

- The Court will not hear a special case which empowers Court to draw such inferences from facts as a jury might draw, and reserves to either party liberty to turn it into a special verdict, C.P. 142
- A replication commenced "And plaintiff as to forty-sixth plea"—it then traversed an allegation in that plea, and went on—"and this the plaintiff prays may be inquired of by the country; and as a further answer in this behalf to the said forty-sixth plea,"—it then alleged new matter by way of answer, and went on—"and this the said plaintiff is ready to verify; and further as to the forty-sixth plea,"—alleging new matter, and concluded—"and this the plaintiff is ready to verify."—This so irregular in form that Court set it aside with costs, upon summary application, C.P. 195
- A count in trespass for breaking and entering plaintiff's rooms, will not be allowed with a count, under 2 Will. & M. sess. 1. c. 5. s. 5, for distraining goods for rent pretended to be due, and selling them, and claiming their double value, &c., there being only one act of trespass. Under second count plaintiff could recover damages, upon proof of a simple act of trespass only, C.P. 196
- After issue and notice of trial, defendant allowed to add a plea, that plaintiff not a sworn broker of city of London, it appearing that trial would not be thereby delayed, C.P. 211
- The Court will not give judgment in a special case stated under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 25, if action is not bond fide brought to try a question really in contest between parties to cause, C.P. 220

- A rule to plead described a plea thus: "that as to sum of 100*l.*, parcel, &c. the defendant, before the commencement of the action, indorsed and delivered to plaintiff a certain bill of exchange for 100*l.*, which plaintiff received in satisfaction of the said sum of 100*l.*" The plea pleaded alleged that plaintiff took and received the bill of exchange "for and on account" of said sum, parcel, &c.—This a variance, and plaintiff entitled to sign judgment, Ex. 206
- Assumpsit for work done by plaintiff as carpenter and bricklayer, and for bell-hanging, painting, and papering done to defendant's house.—Held, by Parker, B., not a case for a view. Scumble.—That a side-bar rule for a view was irregular, which did not contain names of both shewers, and time and place of the meeting of jurors, Ex. 215
- "Rejoining gratis" means rejoining within four days from delivery of replication without a rule for that purpose, and not rejoining within twenty-four hours. Defendant delivered rejoinder shortly before nine o'clock in evening of last day for rejoining, which was also commission day of the assizes: as the practice required record to be passed before three o'clock, plaintiff, without waiting for defendant's rejoinder (the Statute of Limitations), on that morning inserted in issue a rejoinder similar in substance to defendant's, and delivered issue with notice of trial: defendant did not appear at trial, and plaintiff had a verdict.—The issue, Nisi Prius record, and trial were set aside, Ex. 217
- In action against several defendants, who appear by different counsel, it is for the discretion of the Judge whether more than one counsel shall address the jury. Scumble.—That if, at close of plaintiff's case there is only one point for the jury, only one speech should be made, Ex. 229
- Defendant obtained two Judge's summonses for time to plead, neither of which were attended by plaintiff: on non-attendance on second summons, defendant made affidavit of service, and left it with Judge's clerk for signature: the Judge having left chambers without signing it, defendant took out a third summons, returnable on following day, when, on default of attendance, he obtained an order, previously to which, at expiration of time for attending second summons, plaintiff had signed judgment.—Judgment held regular, Ex. 230

Prerogative—Vessel having fire-arms on board, was seized by officers of Board of Customs, and after some time, delivered up, unconditionally, to owners. Action of trespass in Court of Common Pleas, for such seizure and detention, removed into Court of Exchequer by rule absolute in first instance, upon application of Attorney General, Ex. 312

Prescription—Case for widening a channel: Plea, that H. and previous occupiers of a mill as such occupiers had for twenty years enjoyed a watercourse, and had for twenty years as such occupiers of right scoured and widened the channel as often as was required: Replication, traversing enjoyment of watercourse and scouring and widening of right for twenty years.—On special demurrer, replication good, quasi prescription in plea not being severable. And, semble—The plea would have been bad if it had stated the right to scour and widen, without shewing for what purpose it was enjoyed, C.P. 177

Principal and Agent—Liability of party who has cohabited with a female not his wife, and allowed goods to be supplied at her residence on his credit, continues until notice to parties supplying goods that such connexion has ceased, Q.B. 271

— A review was established by an association of shareholders, a committee of whom was appointed "to assist editor in promoting prosperity and circulation of Review, and to obtain, as far as possible without expense, literary contributions, and to aid editor as he might require in all matters connected with his department:"—Held, that this resolution did not empower one of committee to contract for supply of literary articles, or bind shareholders to pay for them when supplied and inserted in Review, C.P. 57

Principal and Factor—Factor for sale cannot sell goods of his principal, in exercise of a sound discretion contrary to principal's orders, to reimburse himself for advances made to principal, after consignment. There is not, in such a case, an authority coupled with an interest which is irrevocable, although the advances made subsequently to consignment might be a good consideration for an agreement that the original revocable authority to sell should become irrevocable, C.P. 258

Principal and Surety—Debt on joint and several bond for 500*l*. Condition, set out on oyer by defendant, recited that one S. had been appointed collector of taxes, and that plaintiff had become surety for payment of such sums as S. should receive; that plaintiff consented to become surety on condition that defendant and S. would indemnify him from all charges, &c. which he should incur as surety. Plea, that plaintiff had not at any time since been in any wise damaged by reason of anything in condition specified. Replication, that S. received, as collector, divers sums of money, amounting in whole to a large sum exceeding 500*l*, to wit, 2,000*l*; that S. did not duly pay said sums so received, nor any of them, but made default, by reason of which plaintiff afterwards was forced to pay to receiver-general a large sum, to wit, 500*l*, and thereby sustained damage to a large amount, to wit, 500*l*. Rejoinder, that plaintiff was not forced to pay said sum in replication mentioned, or any part thereof. No proof of receipt of any money by S. as collector; but that S. had not paid any over to receiver-general, and that plaintiff had been called on as surety to pay the 500*l*, and, having been sued, had submitted to a judgment. Receipt of 500*l*. by S. not admitted on pleadings, and plaintiff, in default of proof of receipt, only entitled to nominal damages. Defendant, having been no party to judgment obtained against plaintiff, judgment only evidence to shew that plaintiff had been sued, or had been subjected to a bond fide pressure, but not evidence that he was legally liable to extent for which judgment was signed, C.P. 23

— See Bond.

Prisoner—It is not necessary that the gaol in which a party committed under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127. is imprisoned should be locally situate within the county of Middlesex, if it is the common gaol in which debtors resident within that county are confined. Period of imprisonment is to be calculated from time when party taken into custody, and not from date of order. Order need not be under seal. The committal being in absence of party does not vitiate it, Q.B. 243

Production and Inspection of Documents—Action by allottee of railway shares against a member of committee of management, for recovery of plaintiff's deposit; subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract had been signed by plaintiff and defendant, and was in hands of solicitors to defendant and company; plaintiff's affidavit stated, that an inspection and copy thereof were necessary for framing his case, and that he could not safely proceed to trial without them:—Rule for liberty to plaintiff or his attorney to inspect and take copies of those documents was made absolute, Ex. 105

Prohibition—H. being brought before magistrates on a charge of unlawful fishing in a private fishery, under 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 39. s. 4, claimed a right to fish in water in question, first, as being a public fishery; secondly, as having a right to fish there, as being a copyholder. The magistrates proceeded to hear the case, and fined him in 30*s*., and costs, refusing to go into evidence as to right claimed by him, and not requiring E. B. to produce his title-deeds, but proceeding on general statements of witnesses as to his right to fishery.—Prohibition refused because magistrates had jurisdiction, and to grant a prohibition would be in effect to repeal clause of the statute which takes away certiorari, Q.B. note (3) 63

— See Compensation. County Court. Tithe.

Promissory Note—Note made by several persons payable to "our and each of our order," and indorsed by one of these persons, a good promissory note within 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9, Q.B. 7

— A note payable to the maker's own order is not a promissory note negotiable under 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9, s. 1; but the maker may, by indorsing it, give the holder a right of action on it against him. A declaration describing such a note as a "promissory note" is good after plea. And an allegation that defendant indorsed such a note is sufficient after plea, C.P. 281

— Declaration that defendant made a promissory note payable to his own order, and indorsed it to Smith & Co., who indorsed it to plaintiff.—This, as against maker and indorser, a valid promissory note payable to Smith & Co. or order; before indorsement it was a note in the nature of a promise to pay to the person to whom the maker should afterwards indorse it; and declaration would be bad on special demurrer for not stating its legal effect, C.P. 286

— Construction of terms of promissory note, whether payable at a particular place; and where declaration bad for want of an averment of presentment for payment there, Ex. 6

— An instrument whereby maker promises to pay to his own order, not a promissory note at all, and, therefore, not transferable as such within 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9. Effect of indorsement is to perfect the incomplete instrument, making it binding between maker and indorsee, and it then becomes an assignable note; if indorsement be in blank it is a note payable to bearer, and properly declared upon as such. Indorsement, in such case, not a new drawing, so as to make fresh stamp necessary, Ex. 315

Quo Warranto—Upon quo warranto information for exercising office of coroner of a borough (appointed under 3 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76,) and judgment for the Crown, relator not entitled to costs by 9 Anne, c. 20, Q.B. 19

Railway—Where by act of parliament incorporating railway company, directors have power to "appoint and displace any of officers of company,"—the appointment of an attorney under the power need not be under seal, Q.B. 162

— Promoters not compellable to take whole of building, though owner cannot be compelled to sell part of it only. Therefore, when company have given notice requiring part of manufactory, mandamus directing them to summon jury to assess compensation for the whole cannot be sustained. Where mandamus requires company to take whole manufactory, prosecutors cannot have the writ for part only, Q.B. 326

— Where plaintiff, a share-broker, bought by order of defendant railway shares, to be paid for on delivery, and shares were delivered, and had fallen in price between time of sale and delivery, and plaintiff not being able to pay at time of delivery vendor demanded shares back from plaintiff, who gave them back to vendor, who sold them, and called upon plaintiff, according to usage of Stock Exchange, to pay difference, which he did,—plaintiff entitled to recover sum paid from defendant as money paid to his use, Q.B. 353

— An award under Lands Clauses Consolidation Act need not assess price of land taken and damage separately. Award of sum for fee simple in possession of claimant's land—unobjectionable, though there was an existing lease of part of land, claimant having used the same terms in his notice of claim. Objection that award contrary to evidence not entertained. Where two arbitrators appointed by parties, appointment of umpire by Board of Trade, more than twenty-one days after appointment of last arbitrator, is valid. The three months within which umpire bound to make award are to be calculated from time when duty devolves upon him, Q.B. 362

— Right of allottee to recover back his deposit though he has signed parliamentary deed and subscribers' agreement empowering directors to pay expenses out of deposits. Where application for allotment of shares do not constitute a contract binding upon plaintiff to take and pay for shares in a concern consisting of 58,000 shares only, instead of 120,000. If application unconditional, and form of allotment conditional, contract not binding upon plaintiff. Where jury warranted in saying that advertisement, stating that the committee had completed the allotment of shares, was a fraudulent misrepresentation, and a material inducement to plaintiff to pay his money, and plaintiff therefore entitled to recover it back in an action for money had and received. Payment of deposit having been obtained from plaintiff by misrepresentation, deed executed by him under same belief forms no answer to action. Plaintiff's subsequent attendance at a meeting does not preclude him from bringing action, C.P. 38

— Action for not accepting railway shares; plea, that they were shares in a joint-stock company in England, exceeding, in number of partners, twenty-five persons, and formed for purpose of executing works which did not require authority of parliament; that company had not been "formed" or established "in any way whatsoever on or before 1st of November 1844; and that, at time of contract, company not completely registered, according to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. At trial, it was shewn that S. went to India, at his own expense, in 1843, and examined the country; that he proposed a railway between M. and D, and spoke of it to persons who agreed to become connected with it; that he got a draft deed in July 1844, and brought it with him to England, where he arrived after 3rd of November 1844; and that company was provisionally registered in May 1845. Judge left it to jury to say whether company had been commenced to be formed before 1st of November 1844, and they found for plaintiff.—Semble—Plea bad on demurrer, for not stating that company had not been commenced to be formed before 1st of November 1844, but good after verdict. Whether plea good or bad, above facts not sufficient evidence for jury that formation of company was commenced before 1st of November 1844, C.P. 89

— Company, provisionally registered, required deposit of 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* on each share allotted. Plaintiff had twenty shares allotted, on which he paid required deposit and received scrip certificates for shares. He signed subscribers' agreement, which gave provisional committee power to carry on undertaking, or any part of it, or to abandon whole, or any part of it, and, out of money which should come to their hands, by way of deposit or otherwise, to make such deposits or investments as might be required by standing orders of parliament, and to pay salaries, &c. and also towards costs of obtaining acts of parliament, &c., and, generally, to apply such monies in paying and satisfying all other costs, expenses, or liabilities, which they might incur in relation to the undertaking. Undertaking proved abortive, and company was dissolved under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28, but without fraud. Money had and received, to recover deposit from member of provisional committee, not sustainable, as plaintiff was not entitled to recover either 2s. 6d. per share, paid as deposit of 10s. in every 100l., under 23rd section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, or 2l. 10s. per share required to be deposited by standing orders, Ex. 29

— Plaintiff signed letter of application for shares in railway company, provisionally registered, therein undertaking to sign subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract, when required. He never received any letter of allotment, but paid deposit on 500 shares, and received scrip certificates in form:—"The subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract having been signed by the person to whom the certificate is issued." He never signed subscribers' agreement or parliamentary contract at all. Scheme having proved abortive, in action against one of managing committee for money had and received.—Held, that he had placed himself in same position as if he had signed parliamentary contract, and was not entitled to recover, Ex. 31

— Sufficiency of declaration of committee of management against allottee for non-payment of deposit upon question whether it discloses a contract between plaintiffs and defendant, on which they may sue him without joining other members of company; and though it does not allege that company was provisionally registered pursuant to the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, or that it was formed previously to date of that act. Declaration not bad for not alleging that company was continuing when shares were allotted to defendant; or for not shewing with sufficient certainty that defendant accepted allotment; nor for not shewing with certainty what the terms to be performed by plaintiffs were, Ex. 37

— Defendant employed plaintiff, a sharebroker at Liverpool, to sell twenty railway scrip for him; plaintiff sold them to F, another Liverpool sharebroker. Defendant not having delivered shares to purchaser, latter bought twenty other scrip at an advanced rate, and plaintiff paid difference between contract price and that at which he bought them. By usage of Liverpool share market, brokers are responsible to each other for fulfilment of contracts relating to sale and purchase of scrip:—Held, that defendant was liable to plaintiff in action for money paid; and, semble, per Parke, B. and Rolfe, B., that defendant liable though not cognizant of such usage, Ex. 78

— In 1845 railway company, provisionally registered, issued prospectus, which stated capital to be 1,500,000l., in 60,000 shares of 25l. each. Plaintiff having paid deposit on forty shares allotted to him, on 4th of November signed subscribers' agreement, containing usual terms as to disposition of deposits. Of the whole amount of shares, about 35,000 were allotted, and out of this number deposits were paid up on 18,160 only. These facts were not communicated to plaintiff before he signed deed.—The withholding of above facts did not amount to fraud, so as to avoid subscribers' agreement, Ex. 97

— In action for calls, under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16. s. 26, it appeared that defendant purchased scrip certificates of shares in question, and before call sent them to company, with a claim to be entered in their books as holder thereof. His name was entered in draft register of shares, but was not entered in sealed register until after call made.—Plaintiffs not entitled to recover; and, semble, in this respect there is no difference between an original subscriber and a transferee, Ex. 103

— Right to inspection and copy of subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract (see Production and Inspection of Documents), Ex. 105

the adoption of all such measures as they may deem requisite for obtaining the necessary parliamentary powers to form a company for the construction of," &c. "and to apply the amount paid for deposits in discharge of any liabilities incurred by them under the general powers vested in them for the prosecution of the undertaking."—In an action for return of a deposit paid, held, that "general powers" meant general powers which directors assumed to carry undertaking into effect; and that if all deposits had been applied for that purpose in a reasonable and proper manner, and before it was clear that scheme must fail, plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Whether deposit-money has been reasonably expended is a question for the jury, Ex. 132

— In action against member of provisional committee of proposed railway company, upon a contract entered into by committee of management appointed by such provisional committee,—it is a question of fact for the jury whether defendant made committee of management his agents to pledge his individual credit, Ex. 196

— Defendant applied to a railway company for an allotment of 100 shares, undertaking to accept the same or any less number, and pay deposit thereon: he received an assignment of sixty shares by a letter of allotment, headed "Not transferable."

—Held, in action for deposit, that the contract was not binding on defendant, as his proposal was absolute, whereas acceptance in letter of allotment was conditional, Ex. 231

— Railway company requiring certain lands for purposes of their railway, gave notice thereof to L, H, and H, parties interested therein, and received from them a notice which stated that they had and claimed an estate and interest in certain copyhold lands and hereditaments, situate &c., and required to be taken by the company, and that they claimed compensation for said lands and hereditaments to amount of 3,344l. 17s. 6d.; that they desired to have the same compensation settled by arbitration, and appointed T. H. one of the arbitrators. Another arbitrator having been appointed by the company, and an umpire nominated by arbitrators, a claim for compensation was made by one T. W., who alleged that he had a leasehold interest in land proposed to be taken by company. Umpire awarded that sum of 1,861l. 2s. 6d. should be paid by company to T. L, R. H, and R. H, as such trustees for purchase of fee simple in possession, free from all incumbrances of and in said copyhold lands, &c. required to be taken by company, but omitted to adjudicate upon T. W's interest. Company took possession of land in question. Award insufficient on ground of umpire not having found value of interest of T. L, R. H, and R. H, and awarded distinct compensation. But Court refused to set it aside; and quære, whether it was not binding on the parties by reason of their conduct. Semble—That notice of T. L, R. H, and R. H, which constituted submission, was not conformable to statute, and therefore award could not be enforced by attachment, Ex. 350

— Award of one gross sum for land required by company and land required to be taken by parties, company not having agreed to submit to arbitration last-mentioned land,—is bad; but Court would not set it aside. Quære—if it could be sustained by reference to the conduct of the parties, Ex. 354

Railways Clauses Consolidation Act—The word "town" in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act means the space on which the inhabitants have permanently collected their dwellings so near to each other that

- they may be reasonably said to be contiguous. It includes all open spaces surrounded by a continuous line of houses; and, semble, all open spaces occupied as mere accessories to the congregated dwelling-houses, although not so surrounded, Ex. 262
- Rate—Certificate of barrister appointed to certify rules of friendly societies, obtained under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 36, is not made conclusive proof of other requisites of statute having been complied with; but is merely one of several conditions precedent, which must all concur to give right of exemption. Birmingham News-room, possession of which is vested in subscribers, and to which newspapers and periodicals are supplied; also share lists, advertisements of sales, and topographical works and directories; and to which library is attached, where, with 300 other volumes, two testaments are kept, which are occasionally used by professional men, who are subscribers, in administering oaths to persons swearing affidavits before them; but no surplus of receipts over expenditure had ever arisen—not a society instituted for purposes of science or literature exclusively, nor one which might not by its laws make a dividend or gift among its members, and therefore not exempt from liability to be rated, by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 36, Q.B. 165
- Before Municipal Corporation Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, borough of Marlborough had separate jurisdiction, derived from charter, and before 55 Geo. 3. c. 51, was subject to rates in nature of county rates, imposed by its own Justices, and therefore, by section 1. of that statute, exempt from county rates: after passing of 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, borough, which was in Schedule B, had no grant of a separate Court of Quarter Sessions; but borough Justices had acted in some criminal matters concurrently with county Justices, and town council had maintained a gaol, repaired a bridge, and contracted with county for maintenance of prisoners.—Borough liable to be assessed to county rate under 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, Q.B. 206
- Court will not grant mandamus to compel Justices to convene party before them for non-payment of rate, bad or very questionable on face of it.
- Semble*—Church-rate, which purports in heading of it to be made "for and towards the repairs of the church, and other incidental charges of the said parish and hamlet," is bad on face of it, Q.B. 326
- An inclosure act enacted, that an annual rent or sum of 90*l.* be vested in rector of parish of N. and his successors for ever, issuing out of and charged upon lands and grounds intended to be inclosed, as well such as should be allotted to rector in lieu of glebe lands lying in common fields, &c. as lands of other landowners in said common fields, &c., "and should be paid and contributed free and clear of and from all deductions, defalcations, or abatements for or in respect of reprises and outgoings whatsoever, other than and except such proportion of the tax charged upon land by authority of parliament as the said annual rent of 90*l.* shall bear to the yearly value of the lands thereby charged with or made liable to the payment of the same rent:" it was declared that yearly rent of 90*l.* should be in lieu and satisfaction of all tithes, &c. arising and renewing in said common fields, &c. and payable by inhabitants of N. with certain exceptions; but rights of rector to tithes of other parts of parish of N. were reserved as before: for tithes of these last-mentioned portions of parish, rector had always since acted been rated to poor.—Held, that he was not rateable in respect of yearly sum of 90*l.*, Q.B. 232
- See Commitment.
- Record—and all subsequent proceedings set aside

Replevin—Declaration in debt on a replevin bond stated a removal of plaint into superior court, on 2nd of November, and a declaration in replevin on 30th of April; an avowry, 9th of July; and death of plaintiff in replevin 16th of November; and charged as a breach that J. S. (plaintiff in replevin) did not prosecute his suit without delay; but on contrary, delayed prosecution of said action for unreasonable time, and until said J. S. long after reasonable time had elapsed for trial, died before issue joined. Breach traversed modo et forma. Plaintiff was at liberty, under this issue, to shew delay in proceedings prior to delivery of declaration. Condition to prosecute without delay may be broken by a delay which does not exceed time for proceeding allowed by practice of superior courts, Q.B. 55

Revenue—Sweet spirits of nitre not "spirits" within 6 Geo. 4. c. 80. s. 101, 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 72, and 5 Vict. c. 25. Party buying sweet spirits of nitre from one not a licensed distiller, and without permit, and removing, and receiving them after their removal, knowing that no duty has been paid, and that they have been illegally distilled, not liable to be convicted under 6 Geo. 4. c. 80. s. 133, 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 53. s. 32, and 2 Will. 4. c. 16. s. 10. Term "spirits" within 6 Geo. 4. c. 80. signifies an inflammable liquid produced by distillation, either pure or mixed only with ingredients which do not convert it into some article of commerce not known in common parlance under generic appellation of spirits, Ex. 9

— Under 43 Geo. 3. c. 99, and 43 Geo. 3. c. 161. the assessment is final, subject to a right of appeal, by party charged, to Commissioners, and from their decision to the Judges. Therefore, upon replevin for goods taken under a distress for assessed taxes, such assessment is an answer to the action; and an allegation in an avowry that plaintiff did in fact "exercise the trade and business of a horse-dealer," was held immaterial. Quare—As to what constitutes "a horse-dealer" within the meaning of assessed tax acts, Ex. 209

Sequestration—Where, in 1834, a writ of sequestration sued out by plaintiffs, indorsed to levy amount of judgment debt recovered; in 1838, statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. passed, by 66th section of which judgments are to carry interest; and in 1839 other execution creditors of defendants lodged writs of sequestration with Bishop,—Court refused to grant application of plaintiffs, that their writ of sequestration should be amended by claim for interest since 1838 being indorsed thereon. Quare—Whether, under writ as it stood, Bishop would be bound to satisfy plaintiffs this interest, Q.B. 47

— See Insolvent Debtor.

Sessions—At the hearing of respited appeal against a poor-rate, appellants not appearing, the Sessions made this order: "Surrey, to wit.—At the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, holden at St. Mary, Newington, on &c. Whereas, at the last General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, holden in and for the county of Surrey, appeal was then made at this court." It then recited an entry and respite "until the next General Quarter Sessions to be holden in and for the county of Surrey;" and it ordered that the appeal be dismissed, and "that the said appellants do forthwith pay to the said respondent the sum of 115*l.* costs."—On motion for certiorari order good, though no notice had been given that more than nominal costs would be asked for. Order sufficiently shewed that it was made at Quarter Sessions holden in and for county of Surrey. Term "costs" shewed sufficiently that they were costs of appeal, Q.B. 215

Set-off—A plea of set-off to the further maintenance of the action, of a debt due from plaintiff to defendant after commencement of suit and before plea, is bad, Ex. 277

— See Broker.

Sheriff—Replevin bond assigned by sheriff, is admissible in action against him for taking insufficient pledges, without proof of its execution, though there is an attesting witness. Acts and declarations of person who acted as replevin clerk admissible against sheriff. Writ of fi. fa., in action on promise for rent admissible against sheriff, to shew proceedings against plaintiff in replevin had proved fruitless. Costs of action against sureties recoverable as damages against sheriff. Declaration sufficient which alleges that sureties were insufficient in fact, without noticing tenant or shewing due inquiry or reasonable caution by sheriff. Whether he used due caution is for the jury, Q.B. 153

— After delivery to sheriff of plaintiff's writ, another writ (which was void) was delivered at suit of J. S. and sheriff granted a warrant on this last-mentioned writ to officer who arrested A. B. under it, having at the time no other warrant in his possession, and detained him in custody under that writ until he was discharged by Judge's order: After that order sheriff still detained A. B. in custody under plaintiff's writ, until a second order for his discharge from that writ was made.—Held, (in error,) that there had been no arrest at plaintiff's suit; and that Judge's order was no justification; but that it was a question of fact for the jury, whether sheriff guilty of negligence in arresting A. B. on supposed writ at suit of J. S. instead of plaintiff, Q.B. 189

— In cases of extortion by a sheriff's officer, the injured party may, by one and the same rule, call on sheriff to pay over excess, and for attachment against officer, Q.B. 216

— Attachment against sheriff for not returning fi. fa., issued on 21st of July; goods were seized on the 22nd; sheriff was ordered on the 24th to return writ; goods were claimed on the 27th: sheriff applied under Interpleader Act, on the 30th; plaintiff attended the summons and adjournments thereof, and declined to contest the claim, which was allowed on the 12th of August; on the 14th of September sheriff returned nulla bona.—The delay having caused no damage to plaintiff, attachment set aside on payment of all costs by sheriff, C.P. 116

— Right of, to reasonable time to search his office for writs after he receives order for prisoner's discharge, Ex. 54

— Action by execution creditor against sheriff, for not levying debt of 60*l.* under fi. fa. At the trial landlord of debtor stated that 46*l.* was due from debtor for rent. The sheriff had withdrawn execution upon notice from landlord, who subsequently distrained and realized less than rent due. Landlord admitted that debtor held under a lease, which was not produced.—Plaintiff entitled to recover amount realized under distress, Ex. 73

— The 1 Vict. c. 55. does not repeal 29 Eliz. c. 4; its only effect is to exempt from the penalties of statute of Elizabeth those cases in which sheriff takes no larger fees than shall be allowed by Judges. Therefore declaration in case for extortion on statute of Elizabeth, need not negative defendant's authority under statute of Victoria to take the fees complained of; that should come by way of defence. The Court will not take judicial notice that an order of the Judges, allowing a scale of fees under 1 Vict. c. 55, was made before alleged extortion. Declaration against sheriff, for extortion, on statute of Elizabeth, that defendant levied under fi. fa. upon goods of plaintiff's debtor a certain sum, to wit, 18*l.* 10*s.*; that he wrongfully took of plaintiff, for serving and executing the execution, a large sum of money, to wit, 16*l.*, being a larger recompence than in statute is limited of and for the sum so levied, that is to say, a large sum, to wit, 15*l.*:—Semble—That this allegation was bad in form, inasmuch as poundage upon the levy allowed by the statute being 1*l.* 8*s.*, the allegation that defendant took 16*l.* which was excessive by 15*l.*, was repugnant; and if "to wit, the sum of 15*l.*" were rejected as surplusage, there would be no sufficient allegation of damage, Ex. 141

Ship and Shipping—Assignee of bill of lading, who claims goods under it, is liable to pay not only the freight, but also demurrage, according to terms of bill of lading, Q.B. 166

— Liability of consignee or indorsee of bill of lading for freight a new contract, consideration for which is delivery of goods to him at his request, and not the carriage of them. Therefore declaration in inferior court containing common indebitatus count for freight, and alleging delivery of goods, at request of defendant, to have been within jurisdiction, sufficiently shews cause of action arose within jurisdiction, Q.B. 305

— In action on charter-party purporting to be made by A. B. "owner of ship Ann," parol evidence that A. B. acted as agent for real owner not admissible, Q.B. 350

— Declaration that before happening of damage complained of, to wit, &c., a certain barge of defendant, of which he was then in possession and then had the management, sank in a navigable river in England, same being a public highway; that it lay concealed under water, so that vessels passing over would be in danger of striking against it, of which defendant had notice; that it thereupon became and was the duty of the defendant while the barge continued so sunk to use due care to prevent danger to vessels, by notice by a buoy or otherwise to persons navigating; that defendant omitted to give such notice, &c.—Held, insufficient for not shewing with sufficient directness any obligation on defendant to give notice; that word "thereupon" in the allegation "it thereupon became and was the duty," was not to be understood as shewing that the proposition following the word was a consequence deducible from what preceded it, but only as shewing time or occasion upon which proposition was averred to have taken place; that allegation in question was an averment of matter of law only, without any sufficient allegation of facts from which it could be inferred; that as declaration did not shew either a continuing possession and controul of defendant at time of collision, nor other special circumstances shewing that he was bound to prevent other vessels being injured, it was insufficient in substance; that mere fact of defendant having possession and controul of barge at time it sank, was not sufficient to render him liable, C.P. 227

Ship and Shipping (continued)—If a ship be so damaged during her voyage that she cannot prosecute it, master has authority to sell her and receive the proceeds. Payment thereof, by person employed to sell, to master or any person he may direct, is good, in absence of notice not to do so from some party interested, C.P. 241

— Declaration on charter-party between plaintiffs and defendant, alleging as a breach, that defendant did not ship a full cargo of linseed according to terms of charter-party. Plea, setting forth charter-party, which stated that it was mutually agreed between plaintiffs, as original charterers of vessel "now at sea, having sailed three weeks ago," and defendant, that said ship should sail to Marseilles, and there load a full cargo of linseed, and should then proceed to one safe port in United Kingdom, and deliver same on being paid freight. Averment, that upon making of charter-party time was an essential part of contract, and that probable situation of vessel, with reference to date of her sailing, was also a material and necessary part of contract; that at making of charter-party, vessel had not sailed three weeks before, but, on contrary, had sailed at a materially and unreasonably later time, to wit, one week later, which plaintiffs at time of making of charter-party knew, wherefore defendant declined to load any cargo. Replication de injuria.—On motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, fact of vessel having sailed three weeks a condition precedent to defendant's liability to load, and defendant entitled to judgment. Semle—per Parke, B., averment of plaintiffs' knowledge an immaterial averment, Ex. 21

— What commissions payable on following letter addressed to a captain and supercargo by his employers:—"Your commissions are 6l. per cent. on the net proceeds of your homeward cargo, after deducting the usual charges as arranged by the African Association, viz., 4l. per ton from the gross sales of the oil when taken from the quay, and 4l. 15s. when warehoused," Ex. 25

— In cases of necessity affecting interest of shipper, and where sale or pledge of cargo is directly or indirectly for his benefit, master becomes his agent for purpose of selling or pledging cargo. Vessel of defendant, the ship-owner, requiring repairs in foreign port, master by one bottomry bond hypothecated for necessary repairs, the vessel, freight and cargo, including goods of plaintiff, the shipper: vessel and freight proving insufficient to defray expenses, plaintiff was compelled to contribute towards the difference, and was forced to pay costs incurred in an Admiralty suit instituted by obligee of bottomry bond.—Held, that ship-owner was responsible to shipper for costs of Admiralty suit, and also for value of goods on a contract of indemnity; and it made no difference that goods were liable by one instrument of hypothecation. To action on such contract defendant pleaded that bottomry bond executed by master, without any express authority from him, defendant, and before same was executed, costs and expenses exceeded value of ship, when repaired, and freight; that defendant upon notice of premises, abandoned ship and all right to her and to all freight, and refused to ratify, and never did ratify act of master in executing bond.—Held bad, on general demurrer, Ex. 238

Slander—A vestry, pursuant to 5 & 6 Vict. c. 108, made out a list of persons qualified and liable to serve office of constable, and returned it to Justices, with a resolution to have a paid constable: plaintiff being named in the list was about to be sworn in as a paid constable by Justices, when defendant, a parishioner, made a statement to them, in presence of a number of persons, affecting plaintiff's character. In action for slander it being objected that statement ought to have been made to vestry, and not to Justices, who could only hear objections as to qualification and liability to serve,—held, that plaintiff was not entitled to recover, if statement made bona fide in furtherance of ends of justice, Ex. 129 — Declaration that plaintiff was a surgeon and accoucheur, that he had attended R. in her confinement, that defendant, in her discourse with R. of and concerning plaintiff in relation to his said profession, falsely, &c. spoke and published,—“I wonder you had him to attend you. Do you know him? He is not an apothecary; he has not passed any examination; he is a bad character; none of the medical men here will meet him. There have been many inquests had upon persons who have died because he had attended them. The words proved as to the inquests were “several have died that the plaintiff has attended, and there have been inquests held upon them.”—Held, that the declaration might be amended, by inserting those words. Also, that if amended words could have been answered by a plea of justification, and words originally inserted could not, defendant should have applied to postpone trial. Also, that words as amended were actionable; and, semle, that words “he is a bad character; none of the medical men here will meet him,” were also actionable, Ex. 151

Stamp—By deed between E. B. (mortgagee) of first part, M. G. (devisee for life under will of mortgagor) of second part, and J. G. (devisee in remainder in fee) of third part, recting an original mortgage for 1,000 years, to secure 150l. and interest, in consideration of 350l. (being 165l. due for principal and interest due on original mortgage, and 185l. further advance), paid by lessor of plaintiff, all parties assigned premises comprised in original mortgage to her for residue of term of 1,000 years, subject to proviso for redemption on payment of the 350l. at a different day from that named in original mortgage. and M. G. and J. G. entered into fresh covenant to pay the whole 350l. at time mentioned in proviso.—Deed required an ad valorem stamp, as upon a new mortgage for 185l., and also a deed stamp, as the covenant by devisees for payment of old as well as new advance created a fresh security, Q. B. 99

— Indenture between and executed by vendors, trustee, plaintiff and defendant. It recited title of vendors to certain copyholds, an agreement for sale to defendant, that he had taken possession and built a house thereon, an agreement by plaintiff with defendant to lend him some money by way of mortgage, and that for purpose of carrying agreements for mortgage and purchase simultaneously into effect, a surrender was to be made of copyholds by vendors, to a trustee, to secure money advanced by plaintiff. Vendors then covenanted with plaintiff, his heirs, &c. and separately with defendant, his heirs, &c., that they had good title, &c.—Indenture single in its nature and object, though treating of several matters, and not within 12 Anne, c. 9. s. 24; therefore, liable only to a 35s. stamp. Another indenture between and executed by plaintiff and defendant, recited former deed, default in payment of sum thereby secured, and further loan by plaintiff; and defendant thereby covenanted to pay whole sum, with interest, and that copyholds should remain further charged with entire sum—This a deed constituting a further charge, and liable only to ad valorem stamp duty of 30s. under 55 Geo. 3. c. 184, C.P. 58

— An agreement, which amounted to a lease, stated that A. agrees to let certain premises to B. for two years, at rent of 50*l.* a year; that B. shall have right of purchasing premises at any time during the term, it being understood that A. is possessed of same premises for his own life, and life of M, and survivor of them.—A 30s. stamp was sufficient. Also, that by agreement A. was bound to make out title to premises for lives of A. and M, and the survivor of them, C.P. 117

— In an action for money had and received, defendant put in evidence following document, written by plaintiff, on back of an unstamped receipt: "Balanced up to this day, as per cash-book, 19th of November 1845."—Admissible without a stamp. Also, that it was good prima facie evidence to shew that, up to its date, there was no debt existing between the parties, C.P. 158

— An agreement, made when 55 Geo. 3. c. 184, schedule, part 1, 'Agreement,' was in force, under which it required a stamp of 1*l.* was, subsequently to 7 Vict. c. 21, stamped, under a penalty, with the stamp of 2s. 6*d.*, as required by the 2nd section and schedule of the latter act.—Agreement held admissible in evidence, Ex. 217

— A written instrument, operating as record of transfer of property, is a conveyance within meaning of Stamp Act; and if it be "a memorandum, letter, or agreement relating to the sale of goods, wares and merchandise," it is exempted from all stamp duty; but if it operate as a transfer of anything else, it must be stamped as a conveyance. A transfer of "fixtures" is at least a transfer of the right of severance; and is therefore a conveyance within words of Stamp Act, which include "transfer of any right; and as fixtures are not goods, wares and merchandise, it is not within the exemption. Therefore, a "memorandum that A. B. has sold goods and fixtures in a shop to C. D." signed by both parties, requires an ad valorem stamp as a conveyance, Ex. 266

Tender—Sufficiency of, where plaintiff being tenant to defendant at yearly rent of 52*l.* sent a person to him with letter:—"I have sent by the bearer 26*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.* to settle one year's rent," and defendant refused to take it, saying that more was due, Q.B. 5

— In debt for detention of a horse, defendant pleaded a lien of 10*s.* for trying the horse in harness: Plaintiff replied a tender: At time horse demanded of defendant he claimed 1*l.* 7*s.* for keep, &c., including 10*s.* for trial, whereupon defendant tendered 19*s.* 6*d.*—Tender not proved, C.P. 198

Tithes—In a parish where there were marsh and other ancient pasture lands, arable lands, and woodlands, there was a modus of 1*s.* per acre, payable to vicar, for all tithes except those of corn and grain, woodland being exempt from tithe by custom. Tithe Commissioner awarded a rent-charge to rector and vicar, in respect of tithe and moduses, which was confirmed under 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 71. s. 52. Valuer, appointed under section 53, in his apportionment, charged certain of ancient pasture lands not only with amount payable in respect of modus, but with a further payment of 1*s.* per acre to rector, in part of rent-charge awarded to him in lieu of tithes of corn and grain, on ground that there was probability of such pasture lands being, at future period, converted into tillage. Commissioners decided, both on principle and on facts, that they would confirm apportionment, if they were not forbidden by a superior court:—Held, that prohibition did not lie, Commissioners having acted within their jurisdiction. Also that apportionment was correct in principle, Q.B. 59

— Declaration that defendant, with force and arms, &c., and with a strong hand, and against form of statute, broke and entered dwelling-house of plaintiff, and broke open doors, windows, &c., and in a forcible manner and with a strong hand dispossessed and expelled plaintiff: Plea as to breaking and entering, &c. liberum tenementum.—Held, that defendant might confine his justification to breaking and entering, and that plea was good; entering manu fortis being matter of aggravation, which defendant need not justify in a civil action, Q.B. 196

— No legal obligation on trespasser to replace what he has pulled down upon another's land, though liable in action of trespass to damages for the loss, Q.B. 233

— against a partner for entering partnership premises, C.P. 50

— Where defendant drove against plaintiff's chaise, and collision threw a person in it to the front of chaise, which caused horse to kick and break the chaise; and declaration stated, that defendant drove his chaise against plaintiff's chaise, and thereby greatly crushed, &c.—Held, a continuing trespass; and that plaintiff had properly alleged, and was entitled to recover all damage occasioned by collision, C.P. 112

— for seizing and taking goods. Plea, a seizure of goods for rent in arrear. New assignment that after seizure, and after payment of arrears of rent and costs of distress, and after defendant had received same in full satisfaction and discharge, and ought to have restored goods, defendant retained possession, and afterwards sold and disposed of them.—On special demurrer, held, that new assignment did not sufficiently allege an act of trespass; that as it did not state that the acceptance of rent took place before impounding, it must be considered to have taken place afterwards; and that where a landlord after a lawful distress and impounding accepts rent in arrear and costs of distress, he is not liable as a trespasser for retaining possession of goods distrained, and selling and disposing of them. The declaration was against two defendants, who severed in their pleadings; new assignment against one only.—Objection to new assignment as being a departure ground of special demurrer only. The plea alleged under a videlicet 4*l.* 1*6s.* to be rent in arrear; new assignment alleged, also under a videlicet, a payment of 4*l.* 1*5s.*, which was averred to be a sufficient sum to discharge arrears and costs, and to have been received in full satisfaction, &c.—A sufficient averment of payment of rent in arrear and costs, C.P. 150

— Plaintiffs were seised in fee of a close, but other persons had right to exclusive possession of surface during part of year. — Plaintiffs might maintain trespass against persons who had dug holes into subsoil during that part of year; but not for an injury committed during such portion of year which affected surface only. "Close" in a declaration in trespass includes subsoil as well as the surface, C.P. 162

— Allegation of conversion matter of aggravation only (see Pleading), Ex. 399

Trial—In ejectment lessor of plaintiff claimed under a will, dated 23rd of September 1844. Defendant claimed under subsequent will of same testator, dated 30th of December 1844. Defendant admitted that will of 23rd of September was a perfect will in every respect, and claimed right, and was allowed by Judge, to begin at trial.—Such admission not an admission of the whole of plaintiff's case, and right to begin improperly conceded to defendant. If it appear that party entitled to begin at trial has been deprived of that right, and his cause has been thereby substantially prejudiced, a new trial will be granted, C.P. 127

— See Practice.

Variance—Where plea stated that a material alteration had been made in contract declared on, and proceeded to specify alteration under a videlicet; and at trial, a different alteration, which was also material, was proved, and no objection taken on ground of variance, plaintiff cannot take advantage of variance in shewing cause against a rule nisi for leave to enter a verdict for defendants. Semble—That it is not necessary under such a plea to prove specific alteration alleged; and, at all events, Judge could amend plea at trial, C.P. 47

— Writ of summons in debt; commencement of declaration in form usual in debt: first count good either in debt or in assumpsit, and second and only other count good in assumpsit.—This a good declaration in assumpsit, and set aside for irregularity, as varying from the process. Plaintiff could not insist that declaration demurrable for misjoinder as an answer to application to set it aside, C.P. 101

Vendor and Purchaser—Plaintiff contracted for purchase of estate from defendant; upon objections to the title, defendant affirmed it to be good, and threatened to resell estate; plaintiff afterwards filed bill for specific performance, and defendant, by his answer, contended that title was good; Master reported that defendant could not make a good title according to terms of contract, and plaintiff's bill was dismissed, without costs.—In action on contract for damages, by reason of defendant failing to make good title, held, that plaintiff could not recover his costs of the Chancery suit, Q.B. 85

— In action by purchaser against vendor of leasehold premises, for breach of contract in failing to make out good title, it appeared that premises were demised by A, B, and C. to J. S, who assigned to defendant. The lease contained a covenant by lessee to insure in joint names of lessors, with proviso for re-entry on breach of covenant by lessee. Premises were insured in joint names of A, B, C, and defendant.—Not a good performance of the covenant to insure, and defendant being bound to shew a good lease, liability to have lease avoided by landlord a valid objection to the title, Q.B. 94

Venue de novo—A venire de novo may be awarded in a criminal case where there has been a mis-awarding of jury process. But Quare—Whether it can issue in a case of felony on account of a defective verdict only. It may be awarded after judgment on an indictment for felony, and may issue to Quarter Sessions, Q.B. 162

Venue—In action on a banker's cheque cannot be changed on the common affidavit, C.P. 137

— The Court will not entertain an application to change the venue till the issues to be tried are ascertained, C.P. 175

Venus (continued)—Application to change, after issue and notice of trial, must shew at least that plaintiff will not be injured or delayed thereby, and that it will be more convenient to defendant, C.P. 210

—Proof of anything directly affecting the amount of damages is material evidence within meaning of ordinary undertaking on bringing back venue, Ex. 255

—Judge at chambers has jurisdiction to set aside rule to change venue, obtained on common affidavit. Where time for pleading expired on 22nd February, and defendant on 23rd took out summons for further time to plead, and on 24th order made for further time on usual terms, and defendant did not draw up order, but in afternoon of 24th (plaintiff not having signed judgment) delivered plea, with rule to change venue, obtained on common affidavit; and Judge at chambers set aside the rule.—Court (Cresswell, J., dubitante) rescinded the Judge's order, C.P. 326

Vestry—A local act empowered "the governors and guardians to call a vestry meeting of the inhabitants of the said parish on Easter Tuesday in every year; at which said vestry meeting all the vacancies in the list of governors and guardians shall be filled up by poll or ballot, or in such way of election as shall be deemed most proper and convenient."—Held, that the meeting must adopt some method of election which secures the expression of will of inhabitants in vestry assembled, as to each candidate; that on a poll being properly demanded, vestry may be adjourned for purpose of enabling all, who are entitled, to give their votes, and that election not confined to those then present. The act, after providing for appointment of governors and guardians, and for filling up of vacancies by remaining governors and guardians, enacts, that after first year, "the inhabitants of the parish in vestry assembled," are to nominate and choose twelve persons, &c.—Held, upon motion for mandamus, that meeting was to be called by, and therefore writ directed to the governor and guardians, Q.B. 220

Waiver. See County Court.

Warrant of Attorney—Upon motion to enter up judgment upon warrant of attorney more than a year old, not necessary to shew to Court that defendant is now alive, if defendant has agreed to dispense with so doing, Q.B. 19

—Where warrant of attorney, bearing date 24th of February, 1847, executed by defendant 20th of March in same year, given to secure payment of money "on 20th day of March next," payment does not become due until 20th of March, 1848, and execution having issued previous to that time, set aside. Upon motion, by assignees, to set aside warrant of attorney given by bankrupt, Court will not enter upon question whether same was given by way of fraudulent preference, Q.B. 49

—See Bankrupt.

Warranty—When implied on sale of provisions (see Vendor and Purchaser), Ex. 190

Waste—Though a strip of waste land between an old inclosure and a highway belongs by presumption of law to the owner of the old inclosure, yet that presumption may be rebutted by shewing there is other land adjoining strip, to which it may have formerly belonged, C.P. 225

Way. See Devise.

Wharfinger—Duty of, in mooring vessels. See Case. Will—is to be construed so as to reconcile words prima facie repugnant, Q.B. 119 —Testator, by will of November 1845, devised estate to his "dear wife Caroline." He had been twice married, in 1834 to Mary, in 1840 to Caroline; they both survived him, and he lived with the latter till his death in November 1845:—The words "dear wife" not inapplicable to Caroline, and she entitled as devisee, C.P. 108

—Testatrix, in 1786, devised real estate to her brother-in-law T. K. and her sister A. K., his wife, for their lives, and from and after their decease to her nephew, J. G. K., son of said T. K. and A. K., his heirs and assigns for ever: but in case J. G. K. should not survive T. K. and A. K., and should die without an heir lawfully begotten, then and in such case testatrix devised same to next heir of said T. and A. K., their heirs and assigns for ever: J. G. K. died an infant in lifetime of his parents; but soon after his death, another son of T. and A. K. was born, who was also called J. G. K. A. K. died in 1795. The second J. G. K. married, and had issue a son, J. K., and died in 1823: T. K. died in 1842.—Held, that "next heir" meant the true heir of T. and A. K.; and executory devise over took effect only on death of T. K., surviving devisee for life, when estate vested in J. K., the heir of T. and A. K., Ex. 154

—See Devise.

Witness—Where commission to examine witnesses abroad issues under 1 Will. 4. c. 22. s. 4, names of Commissioners and place at which it is to be executed must be specified in order authorizing commission, or in some subsequent order. To commission authorizing swearing of interpreter on examination of French witnesses,—return shewing that interpreter had been sworn, need not state that he interpreted evidence of any of the witnesses. Whether return to commission directing witnesses to be examined apart must expressly state that they were so examined, Q.B. 14

—Criminal information not an action depending within 1 Will. 4. c. 42, and order for examination of witness on interrogatories not made in such a matter, Q.B. 55

—Commission to examine witnesses directed Commissioners to summon witnesses at certain place, to be appointed by them for that purpose, in Newfoundland, and then and there examine them apart, visd voce, and commission and depositions to be returned sealed up: it was proved that papers in handwriting of Commissioners, and sealed up, purporting to be return of commission, were delivered at Master's office: commission returned was identified as that issued: examinations did not on face of them purport to be taken apart.—The commission sufficiently provided for time, place, and manner of examining witnesses: that there was due proof of return; and that it must be presumed that witnesses were examined apart, Q.B. 209

—Defendant who suffers judgment by default a competent witness for plaintiff in action for malicious prosecution, Q.B. 313

not a writ, nor has it incidents of one, and need not be tested in term, Q.B. 355

— Where a witness volunteered a statement which was not evidence, held that it was the duty of Judge not to notice it, and that he was right in refusing to recall witness to correct mistake of jury as to what statement was, C.P. 62

— In action of tort, evidence of a co-defendant who has suffered judgment to go by default, not admissible; and being a party to record, interested in event of the suit, his evidence is not made admissible by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, C.P. 113

— Attesting Witness. See Evidence.

— See Poor Law. Trial.

Words—"Appropriation," Ex. 307

— "Cause of Action," Ex. 157

— "Close," C.P. 162

— "Commit suicide," in life policy, C.P. 2

— "Estate," "Who have issue," Ex. 327

— "Horse-dealer," Ex. 309

— "Next heir," Ex. 154

— "Town," Ex. 262

Writ of Error—Court of Requests Act provided that plaintiff suing in any of courts at Westminster for cause of action recoverable in court of requests, should not be entitled to any costs: upon error coram nobis, error assigned was, that judgment had been entered for debt and costs, whereas defendant, when action was brought, resided within jurisdiction of court of requests, and was liable to be sued in that court: plea, in nullo est erratum.—Judgment, so far as regarded costs, reversed, Q.B. 137

— A rule to assign errors, before moving to quash writ for delay, under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 68. s. 5. is not necessary. Affidavit that since filing writ of error "no process or other proceeding has been had or taken by or on behalf of the said defendants to prosecute the same,"—is a sufficient statement that error not assigned, Q.B. 208

— does not lie upon a judgment of a superior court upon a feigned issue, under 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 71, s. 46. (the Tithe Commutation Act.) The Court of Exchequer Chamber quashed a writ of error on such a judgment, Ex. 235

— See Habeas Corpus. Arrest.

Writ of Trial—may be tested in vacation, Q.B. 216

— The plaintiff having obtained a verdict on writ of trial, a Judge at chambers, instead of staying execution of writ, made an order, 6th of July 1846, for setting verdict aside for irregularity of the notice of trial. This not a nullity, but an irregularity; and an application to rescind order made on last day of Trinity term 1847 too late, Ex. 52
